that a determination of it will not affect plaintiff's right to proceed with the cause.[26] However, the rule does not apply if the motion is not filed within the time to plead,[27] except in jurisdictions where defendant may prevent default by pleading at any time before default is entered;[28] and it clearly does not apply if the motion is filed after the motion for default is served and filed,[29] or if the motion has been abandoned by defendant[30] or the remedy sought by the motion waived.[31]

In applying the rule to particular cases, it has been held that a judgment by default cannot be entered while there remains undisposed of a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain,[32] or to require plaintiff to state his causes of action separately,[33] or for compulsory amendment of the declaration,[34] or for a bill of particulars,[35] or to strike out a pleading[36] or certain allegations thereof,[37] or to quash the summons or the service or return thereof,[38] or to dismiss the cause or complaint,[39] or for a change of venue,[40] for security for costs,[41] for a continuance,[42] or for the removal of the cause to a federal court.[43] On the other hand, it has been held that such a judgment is not prevented by the pendency of a motion to quash the writ,[44] to dismiss the action,[45] to set aside an amended complaint,[46] or for security for costs.[47]

Where the proceedings are stayed until the hearing and determination of a motion, plaintiff may, on decision on the motion, proceed at once to enter judgment by default, without serving notice of the order,[48] unless the order provides for notice.[49]

§ 200. Operation and Effect of Default and Judgment

A judgment by default has, in general, the same force and effect as a judgment rendered after a trial on the merits.

Error in filing

Judgment by default should not be entered against defendant who within apt time filed motion to dismiss complaint and served notice of its filing on plaintiff, notwithstanding motion to dismiss complaint was filed in office of clerk of court instead of being presented to court.—People, for Use of Heidinger, v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 7 N.E.2d 472, 289 Ill.App. 498.

After security deposited

Where nonresident plaintiff deposited security for costs in response to defendant's motion, but did not give defendant notice as required by statute that costs had been furnished, entering default judgment against defendant for failure to serve affidavit of merits was error.—Automobile Banking Corporation v. Birkhead, 36 A.2d 608, 22 N.J.Misc. 135.

Motion in nature of plea

Where defendant filed motion for costs and for injunction against plaintiff's prosecuting suits without paying costs in original matter, the motion was in the nature of a plea in abatement, and the court properly refused to enter default judgment.—Griffin v. Arney, Mo.App., 12 S.W.2d 95.

Signing of order

A default judgment for plaintiff was not erroneous because of motion pending at time of its entry to require plaintiff to furnish bond for costs, where defendant failed to have judge sign order fixing amount of bond.—Wilson v. Lagasse, 179 So. 472, 14 La.App. 463.

48. N.Y.—Tuska v. Jarvis, 113 N.Y. S. 767, 61 Misc. 224.

49. N.Y.—Tuska v. Jarvis, supra.

The mere entry of a default is not the equivalent of a judgment,[50] nor is it a final disposition;[51] in legal effect it has been said to be the equivalent of a demurrer.[52] A default does not affect the status, rights, or liability of a codefendant[53] or intervening claimant,[54] or of defendant himself except as to the matters necessarily admitted by the default.[55]

A judgment by default has the same force and effect as a judgment rendered after a trial on the merits,[56] except in so far as it is governed by statutory provisions,[57] and it is not to be discredited because of the manner in which it is taken.[58] It determines plaintiff's right to recover, and defendant's liability,[59] although the amount of recovery remains in some cases to be ascertained.[60] A final judgment cannot be rendered in defendant's favor without first setting aside a default judgment that has been entered against him.[61]

As waiving or curing defects. A judgment by default or nil dicit operates as a waiver or release of any mere formal errors or irregularities in the previous proceedings,[62] such as in plaintiff's pleading;[63] but it does not cure a totally defective declaration or complaint[64] or the entire absence of an allegation of a material fact,[65] nor does it cure or waive radical defects or errors which go to the authority of the court to enter the judgment[66] or to the foundation of plaintiff's cause of action.[67]

Vt.—Sheldon v. Sheldon, 87 Vt. 152.

Preliminary entry of default generally see infra § 206.

Intermediate step
An entry of default is a judgment only in the sense that it adjudges the case in default, and is only an intermediate step authorizing plaintiff to enter verdict and judgment subject to statutory exceptions. —Ryles v. Moore, 18 S.E.2d 672, 191 Ga. 661.

Status as "party"
A defendant who has been merely defaulted is still a "party" to the suit.—Webb v. Willett Co., 33 N.E.2d 636, 309 Ill.App. 504.

Effect of laches
Where default had been entered several months prior to defendant's application to intervene, or to plead to court's jurisdiction, or to traverse allegations of complaint, denial of application was held proper exercise of court's discretion.—Sauve v. Hamilton, 271 P. 630, 84 Colo. 498.

Tacit joinder of issue
Effect of entry of preliminary default is to form tacit joinder of issue on basis of general denial, and it merely serves to put plaintiff on proof of relevant facts alleged.—Whalen v. Davis, 9 So.2d 424, 200 La. 1066—Russo v. Aucoin, La.App., 7 So.2d 744.

Effect as nonsuit or dismissal
Where court, on failure of plaintiff to appear at time set for trial, heard evidence and submitted issues, judgment for defendant was essentially a judgment of nonsuit or dismissal, and the irregular proceeding did not affect its essential nature as such.—Craver v. As confession of judgment. A judgment by default has been held to operate as a judgment by confession,[68] especially where it is rendered on the withdrawal of a plea or answer,[69] which, in its effect, is not precisely coextensive with a judgment by express confession.[70]

§ 201. —— Default as Admission

a. In general
b. Allegations in pleadings
c. Amount of claim or damages
d. Other matters

a. In General

A default operates as an admission by the defendant of the truth of the cause of action as set forth in the plaintiff's pleading, but not as an admission that the facts alleged are in law sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

A default or nil dicit operates as an admission by defendant of the truth of the cause of action as set up in the declaration or complaint,[71] or admits liability on the part of defendant,[72] or amounts to an admission of plaintiff's right to recover.[73] However, it has also been held that a default does not admit that the facts alleged are in law sufficient to constitute a good cause of action or to entitle plaintiff to the relief prayed.[74]

Constructive service; nonresidents. Where the service of process on defendant is constructive only, as by publication, his default is not a sufficient admission of the allegations of the complaint to authorize a judgment in accordance therewith;[75] and, as shown infra §§ 211, 213, in order for plaintiff to obtain judgment it is necessary for him to show the proper issuance and service of process on defendant, as well as the facts which entitle him to recover. A default in pleading has been held not an admission of the court's jurisdiction over a nonresident of the county.[76]

b. Allegations in Pleadings

A defendant's default has been held to admit all matters properly pleaded and material to the issues.

It has been broadly held that default by defendant operates as an admission of all matters alleged in plaintiff's pleading;[77] more particularly, a default has been held to constitute an admission of traversable[78] allegations that are well and properly pleaded and are material to the issues[79] or only such allegations as are necessary to obtain the particular relief sought.[80]

The rules as to admissions resulting from default have been said to obtain even though the allegations are untrue.[81]

c. Amount of Claim or Damages

A default in an action for an unliquidated claim admits the plaintiff's right to recover something, but not the amount; where the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled is fixed or liquidated, or ascertainable by mere calculation, a default admits his right to the sum demanded.

Where the action is in tort or for an unliquidated claim or amount, a default admits plaintiff's right to recover something,[82] at least nominal damages,[83] but does not admit the amount to which he is enti-

Allegations not controverted by answer are deemed true, although plaintiff proceeded with evidence as though issue were joined where defendant was in default and not present.—Stein v. Rainey, 286 S.W. 53, 315 Mo. 535.

Default in prior cause carries with it the admission of all facts alleged in that action and that admission may be applied against defendant in a new suit.—Thorne v. McKinley Bros., 56 P.2d 204, 5 Cal.2d 704.

Admissions of codefendant

(1) The default of one defendant, although an admission by him of allegations of petition, does not operate as an admission of such allegations as against contesting codefendant.—Fawkes v. National Refining Co., 108 S.W.2d 7, 341 Mo. 630.

(2) Where one defendant is liable for the negligence of his codefendant, default by the latter has been held an admission of the negligence charged and is imputable over to, and binding on, the other.—Holland v. Kodimer, 77 P.2d 843, 11 Cal.2d 40.

tled,[84] and there is no final judgment until the amount is ascertained, as discussed infra § 216.

Fixed or liquidated amount. Where the cause of action is such that plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is entitled to recover a fixed or liquidated amount,[85] or where the amount of his damages is ascertainable by mere calculation,[86] defendant's default admits plaintiff's right to recover the sum demanded in the declaration or complaint, and judgment may be entered therefor, without further proof, and without an assessment of damages.

d. Other Matters

The defendant, by defaulting, admits the capacity in which the plaintiff sues, the status or relationship of the defendant as alleged, and the jurisdiction of the court, in addition to other matters.

A default has been held to admit the capacity in which plaintiff sues,[87] that defendant is the person named in the writ and intended to be sued,[88] that he occupies the position or status or fills the relation to others which is alleged in the declaration,[89] and that the court has acquired jurisdiction of his person and of the cause of action.[90] It also admits the due execution and validity of the instrument sued on,[91] that plaintiff's claim or demand is just[92] and legal,[93] and that defendant has no defense to the action.[94]

A default constitutes an admission of the fair inferences and conclusions of fact to be drawn from plaintiff's allegations;[95] but it does not admit

In foreclosure or kindred proceeding, default by defendant who is called on to disclose supposed but unknown interest in the subject of action admits that such interest is forced inferences[96] or matters or conclusions of law,[97] nor does it admit allegations of facts extrinsic to plaintiff's cause of action[98] or unnecessary to its establishment,[99] facts alleged by a codefendant,[1] or statements in portions of the record not constituting part of plaintiff's pleadings.[2]

Amendment. A default admits the facts of an amendable statement of facts as far as it can be amended,[3] but not of an amendment setting up new facts.[4]

Value. It has been held that a default operates as an admission of value as alleged by plaintiff;[5] but there is also authority to the contrary.[6]

Plaintiff's failure to reply to a plea covering only part of the issues does not preclude him from trying issues not met by the plea.[7]

§ 202. —— Right to Notice of, and Participation in, Further Proceedings

Except as otherwise provided by statute or rules of practice, the defendant, after entry of default, ordinarily is not entitled to notice of, or to participate in, further proceedings in the case.

A defendant against whom a default is entered is out of court,[8] and except as otherwise provided by statute or rule of practice,[9] or in the absence of a request for, or an order requiring, notice[10] is not entitled to notice of further proceedings in the case,[11] including notice of an application for entry of the default judgment, as discussed infra § 208, or of assessment of damages against him, as discussed in Damages § 170.

The entry of default is a privilege which is waived by proceeding with the cause without taking advantage of the default.

less he was ignorant of the default at the time.[25] Plaintiff will be held to have waived defendant's default where he voluntarily extends the time for defendant to plead[26] or appear,[27] accepts a pleading filed out of time,[28] files a replication to a pleading so filed,[29] or goes to trial without objection.[30]

A default on the part of plaintiff may likewise be waived by defendant's failure to take advantage of it,[31] as where, after the default, he abandons his defense and does not appear at the trial.[32]

B. PROCEDURE IN TAKING DEFAULT AND ENTERING JUDGMENT

§ 204. Power of Court in General

A preliminary default may be entered, and a final judgment by default may be rendered only by a court of competent jurisdiction, unless such power is vested in the clerk of court or in a court commissioner.

Since the giving of judgment on a legal obligation, when defendant is in default, is a judicial act,[33] judgment may be rendered by a court possessing jurisdiction;[34] and the fact that the clerk has power to enter such a judgment does not affect the court's power to render the judgment.[35] Except in so far as power to enter a judgment by de-

What constitutes waiver

(1) Some act disclosing an implied or express intent to waive the default is required to constitute a waiver thereof.—Kingsbury v. Brown, 92 P.2d 1053, 60 Idaho 464, 124 A.L.R. 149.

(2) A mere appearance generally after entry of default does not constitute a waiver of the default.—Kingsbury v. Brown, supra.

(3) Plaintiff's motion to strike an unauthorized and void answer does not affect the conclusiveness of the default or judgment.—Kingsbury v. Brown, supra.

(4) Particular acts see 34 C.J. p 177 note 6 [a].

General appearance, made before default is actually entered, is in time.—Edenfield v. G. V. Seal Co., 241 P. 227, 74 Mont. 509.

Waiver not shown

(1) Plaintiff's right to judgment for want of affidavit of defense held not waived by voluntarily placing case at issue in reliance on agreement of defendant's attorney to file pleading.—Upton-Lang Co. v. Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. of New York, C.C.A.Pa., 57 F.2d 133.

(2) Other facts not constituting waiver see 34 C.J. p 177 note 6 [b].

In Texas

(1) It has been held that participation in the trial by a codefendant who defaulted did not waive the filing of a formal denial of the allegations of plaintiff's petition and that such codefendant could not complain because no proof of admitted facts was made by plaintiff.—Brill v. Guaranty State Bank of Goose Creek, Com.App., 280 S.W. 537.

(2) And it has been held that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against defendants who did not appear and answer, notwithstanding he did not insist on judgment by default.—Foust v. Jones, Civ.App., 90 S.W.2d 665.

(3) However, the rule in the text has been followed.—Corpus Juris cited in Shaw v. Whitfield, Civ.App., 35 S.W.2d 1115.—Corpus Juris cited in Brasher v. Carnation Co. of Texas, Civ.App., 92 S.W.2d 573, 574.

Acquiescence in delay

Iowa.—City of Des Moines v. Barnes, 20 N.W.2d 895.

Effect of extension on time of trial

A waiver of default and grant of right to answer, with the understanding that answer will be filed within a few days and that defendant will be ready to try the case during the following term implies that no steps will be taken by him to delay the trial, and so he waives his right to move for a stay previous to the trial, even though he alleges facts which are claimed to render the arbitration law a bar to judgment by plaintiff without first resorting to arbitration.—Clyde Renco Mill Co. v. Judge of another court

County judge is without jurisdiction to grant default judgment in action pending in supreme court.—Kline v. Snyder, 231 N.Y.S. 275, 133 Misc. 128.

Place of action by judge

(1) Judge is authorized to give default judgment outside court in which suit was brought.—Gray v. Bank of Moundville, 107 So. 804, 214 Ala. 260.

(2) Under statutes and rules of court, when a party is entitled to a judgment by default and has complied with the rules adopted by the court for the purpose of obtaining it, and the court is open, the judge of the court may, anywhere in the county, circuit, or state, sign an order in writing to the clerk to enter in the minutes a judgment by default for the amount named therein, or write, sign, and forward to the clerk, a judgment by default to be filed in the cause.—Carothers v. fault is vested in the clerk of the court, as discussed infra § 205, or a court commissioner,[36] a judgment by default may be rendered only by a court.[37] So, too, in cases where the clerk of court is not authorized to make it, a preliminary entry of default should be made only by the court;[38] or the judge[39] authorized to preside over the tribunal and empowered to hear and determine the issues between the parties.[40] In the absence of an appearance, strict compliance with the proceedings necessary to the rendition of judgment will be exacted.[41]

§ 205. Authority and Duty of Clerk

The authority of a clerk of court to make a preliminary entry of default, or to enter a final judgment by default without authority from the court, is purely statutory.

In making a preliminary entry of default, or entering a judgment of default, a clerk of court exercises a purely ministerial, and not a judicial, function.[42] Where a preliminary entry or interlocutory judgment of default is necessary or proper, as discussed infra § 206, the clerk of the court is authorized, under some statutes, to make such entry on defendant's failure to appear or answer.[43] The statutory provisions giving him such authority must be strictly construed,[44] and, such power or authority, being purely statutory,[45] may be exercised by him only in cases which clearly come within the terms of the statute[46] and only to the extent authorized;[47] but the entry when authorized may be made by him notwithstanding the court is in session,[48] and notwithstanding the judge is disqualified to try the case.[49]

Entry of judgment. As in the case of judgments generally, as discussed supra § 108, where a default judgment is rendered by the court, it should be reg-

Duty of clerk
(1) There should be strict compliance with statutes expressly requiring the clerk to enter defaults.—Security Finance Co. v. Gentry, 109 So. 220, 91 Fla. 1015, followed in 109 So. 222, 91 Fla. 1024.

(2) Under a statutory provision contemplating, in certain cases, both entry of default and entry of judgment by the clerk, it is the duty of the clerk, in a case within such provision, and on application by plaintiff, to enter the default.—Commercial Bank & Trust Co. v. Jordan, 278 P. 832, 85 Mont. 375, 65 A.L.R. 968—34 C.J. p 178 note 23 [a].

(3) However, another statutory provision that, in other cases, if no answer, demurrer, or motion has been filed with clerk of court within time specified in summons, clerk must enter default, and thereafter plaintiff may apply for relief demanded in complaint, is directory rather than mandatory.—Mitchell v. Necessity of complaint and timely filing thereof

(1) Default judgment cannot be entered by clerk without application to court, unless there is complaint.—Leroy Arnold, Inc., v. Mackey, 222 N.Y.S. 225, 129 Misc. 643.

(2) Complaint must be filed as part of judgment roll to authorize clerk of court to enter judgment on default.—Juskowitz v. Stern, 283 N.Y.S. 955, 158 Misc. 28.

(3) Where plaintiff in law action does not file declaration on or before rule day to which process is made returnable or on or before next succeeding rule day, entry by clerk, not in term time, of final judgment for plaintiff on rule day thereafter on filing his declaration, unless further time has been duly allowed by the court, is unauthorized.—Daniell v. Campbell, 101 So. 35, 88 Fla. 63.

Cause of action within statute

Question whether clerk was authorized to enter a default judgment against one of defendants was not dependent on whether complaint stated a cause of action, but on whether the complaint stated a cause of action within statute authorizing the clerk to enter default judgment in an action arising on contract for the recovery of money or damages only.—Lynch v. Bencini, 110 P.2d 662, 7 Cal.2d 521.

Ascertainment of amount from complaint

(1) Clerk has right to enter default judgment only where the proper amount appears from terms of contract as alleged in complaint or follows therefrom by mere mathematical computation.—Lynch v. Bencini, supra.

(2) The word "amount," in statute authorizing clerk of district court to enter judgment after default, indicates that clerk is empowered to enter judgment only in instances on an account or written instrument or other contract, express or implied, for payment of money only where plaintiff's verified original petition is such that mere inspection thereof or computation from data supplied by pleading enables clerk to enter a judgment for a fixed sum with costs.—Kimbel v. Osborn, Wyo., 156 P.2d 279.

(3) In determining whether an action is one arising on contract for the recovery of money or damages only so as to authorize the clerk to enter default judgment, allegations of complaint and the terms of the contract are to be considered notwithstanding the prayer is for the certain amount.—Lynch v. Bencini, 110 P.2d 662, 17 Cal.2d 521.

57. Fla.—Coslick v. Finney, 140 So. 216, 104 Fla. 394.
34 C.J. p 179 note 46.

Where exercise of discretion and taking of evidence are necessary to determine amount of damages, clerk has no power to enter default judgment.—Lynch v. Bencini, 110 P.2d 662, 17 Cal.2d 521.

Sufficiency of defendant's pleading

(1) The clerk is without authority to decide that a plea is not good and then enter default judgment for want of any plea.—Albert M. Travis Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 139 So. 141, 102 Fla. 1117.

(2) It has been held, however, that default judgment entered by clerk for failure to reply to answer in nature of counterclaim is not irregular, even if it is erroneous as to the nature and sufficiency of defendant's pleading as a counterclaim.—Finger v. Smith, 133 S.E. 186, 191 N.C. 818.

allow interest in entering default judgment is discussed infra § 214 c.

A judgment entered by the clerk without authority to do so is void.[61] If, however, a mistake or irregularity, not going to the jurisdiction, is committed by the clerk in entering the judgment, the judgment is not void, but erroneous.[62] Even where the clerk is disqualified to enter default judgment in a particular case, the judgment entered by him is not void, but only voidable,[63] unless it is in violation of some statute.[64] If plaintiff has done all that is required to entitle him to a default judgment, he cannot be prejudiced by the clerk's failure to enter it[65] properly.[66] Where a default judgment rendered by the court is noted on the docket of the trial judge, the clerk's failure to enter it does not affect its validity,[67] and the omission may, in a proper case, be supplied nunc pro tunc.[68]

§ 206. Preliminary Entry of Default

A preliminary entry of default is proper; but there is a divergence in the rules obtaining under different statutes in respect of its necessity as a condition precedent to final judgment by default.

An entry of default is a proper procedural step.[69] Under some statutes, a final judgment on default may not be rendered until there has been a preliminary entry of the default, or of an interlocutory judgment of default,[70] unless the requirement is waived.[71] Under other statutes, such an entry is not necessary.[72] Under still other statutes, while it is the practice to call defendant and make an entry of the default, an omission to do so is at most a mere irregularity which does not render the judgment void,[73] although it may constitute grounds for reversing it;[74] the default may be entered in the trial court at any time while the proceedings are in fieri.[75] Under the practice in some jurisdictions, entry of default should not be made until after service of notice.[76]

An entry of the words "in default," or their equivalent, on the appearance docket is necessary[77] and sufficient[78] to comply with a statute so providing. A statute requiring all defaults to be entered in full in a default docket is not complied with by entry of a default in a book designated as a rules judgment docket.[79] An examination of the files is required before entering a default.[80]

(3) A statute relating to an interlocutory judgment by default is mandatory in the sense that plaintiff has a right to, and the court may, not deny him, an interlocutory judgment at or after the time of the default; but the failure of plaintiff to take an interlocutory judgment does not render it improper or irregular for him to await the coming on of the case for trial and then prove his damages and take a final judgment by default where defendant remains in default.—Cornoyer v. § 207. Time for Taking Default and Entering Judgment

a. In general
b. Expiration of time allowed for appearance or pleading
c. After entry of default
d. Term of court
e. Day and hour
f. In vacation or at chambers

a. In General

There is a conflict of authority on the question whether a premature default judgment is void or only voidable, as well as on the question whether a delay of several years precludes the taking of a default judgment.

A statutory provision for entry of judgment in defaulted cases at any time after default has been construed to be restricted to unanswered defaulted cases and not to apply where the default consists of failure to appear for trial.[81] A judgment by default, of course, may not be entered against defendant until he is in default, and, therefore, neither a simple default nor a judgment by default may regularly be taken and entered against defendant until the expiration of the period prescribed by statute or rule of practice for taking the step or proceeding, on the failure to take which the default is based,[82] or until the expiration of the time stipulated or agreed on by the parties.[83]

According to some authorities, a premature judgment by default is not void, but is merely irregular and voidable.[84] Under this view a default judgment rendered or entered prematurely will be upheld unless it is attacked at the time and in the manner provided by law;[85] and it is effective until reversed[86] or set aside.[87] Defendant may waive the irregularity and so ratify the judgment,[88] and, if he takes no steps to vacate or reverse the judgment, or otherwise to correct the error, he may be held to have waived it.[89] According to a number of other authorities, a premature judgment by default is void;[90] and under this view a default judgment prematurely entered is not validated by its subsequent confirmation[91] or by the fact that it is not made final until the expiration of the usual time,[92] or by the fact that defendant has suffered no injury.[93]

(1) The text rule obtains where the premature judgment is recorded and signed by the judge.—Hoey v. Aspell, 40 A. 776, 62 N.J.Law 200.

(2) On the other hand, a premature judgment is void where it is entered by plaintiff's attorney without the signature of the judge.—Westfield Trust Co. v. Court of Common Pleas of Morris County, 178 A. 546, 115 N.J.Law 86, affirmed 183 A. 165, 116 N.J.Law 190.

Lack of vacation

Brimacombe, 72 P.2d 1107, 58 Nev. 156, rehearing denied 75 P.2d 734, 58 Nev. 156.

92. La.—Hart v. Nixon, 25 La.Ann. 136.

93. La.—Hart v. Nixon, supra.

Delay. It has been held that, in the absence of statutory limitation, the lapse of several years after the bringing of suit does not prevent the entry of a default judgment,[94] and that, even where a statute provides that an action must be dismissed where no answer has been filed and plaintiff has failed to have judgment entered within a stated number of years after service of summons, a default judgment entered after the expiration of the statutory period is not void,[95] as the court has jurisdiction to render it,[96] even though it is erroneous and subject to direct attack on appeal.[97] However, it has also been held that plaintiff's inaction in the case, including his omission to have a default judgment entered for several years, constitutes a waiver of his right[98] or constitutes an abandonment of the suit, so that a default judgment taken after such long delay is null and void,[99] and defendant is not charged with notice of the taking of the default judgment.[1]

b. Expiration of Time Allowed for Appearance or Pleading

A judgment by default is premature where it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed for appearance, if it is taken for want of appearance, or where it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed for filing a plea or answer, if it is taken for want of a plea or answer.

A judgment by default is premature if it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed by law for defendant to enter his appearance, if taken for want of appearance,[2] or if it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed for the filing of a plea or answer, if taken for want of a plea or answer.[3] Thus a judgment by default is premature where the required length of time has not elapsed between the service of the summons or writ and the return day;[4] or where it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed in the summons or writ,[5] although it is in excess of the time allowed by law;[6] or where it is entered before the expiration of the time allowed to appear, plead, or answer, after constructive service by publication,[7] or before the expiration of the time limited in an order extending the time to plead,[8] unless such extension was fraudulently obtained or collusively granted.[9] Where both substituted and personal service is made, judgment by default may be entered on the expiration of the time to answer limited by personal service, although that limited by substituted service is not exhausted.[10]

In case of joint defendants all must have the full time allowed for answering; and a judgment by default may not be entered before the expiration of such time.[11]

(1) Default judgment on amended complaint was erroneously entered against defendant who appeared and moved for dismissal, which motion was argued and overruled and defendant allowed ten days after notice in which to answer, where no notice was served on defendant.—Bolognese v. (2) Likewise, where a motion to dismiss the complaint was overruled and the court entered a rule against defendant to plead to the complaint within thirty days, a default entered before rule to plead had expired was improper.—Lusk v. Bluhm, 53 N.E.2d 135, 321 Ill.App. 349.

c. After Entry of Default

Where there are no controlling statutory provisions and no compelling reason for delay, final judgment may be rendered immediately after preliminary entry of default or at any time thereafter.

Where a preliminary entry of default has been made, the final judgment is usually deferred, as discussed infra § 216, until the assessment of damages, where these are uncertain or unliquidated; but, where there is no such reason for delay and in the absence of statutory limitations, final judgment may be rendered as of the day of the default,[12] or at any time thereafter,[13] and may be taken as of the term when the default was entered.[14] A statutory provision requiring the judgment to be entered immediately after the entry of default is merely directory,[15] and for the benefit of the party obtaining the judgment,[16] and hence the adverse party may not complain of a delay in entering the judgment.[17] Under some statutes, a default may not be made final until a succeeding day[18] or until the elapse of a certain number of days, after the entry of default.[19]

d. Term of Court

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a default judgment ordinarily may be rendered during any term of court after the default.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a default judgment may be rendered at any time during any term of court after the default,[20] except that, as indicated infra subdivision e of this section, when the case is placed on the trial docket, judgment should be rendered on or after the day on which the case is set for trial. In some jurisdictions this matter is governed by statute and the terms of the statute, together with the circumstances in regard to service of process, appearance, and pleading, which control in determining the term of court at which such a judgment may or should be entered in a particular case;[21] and such a statutory regulation may not be rendered nugatory or materially modified by a conflicting rule of court.[22] Under some statutes and conditions, a default judgment may be entered at the first or return term of the court,[23] as where a given number of days have elapsed since service of process.[24] Under other statutes and conditions, it may not properly be entered as final at the return term or appearance term,[25] unless defendant consents,[26] but only at the next term thereafter,[27] as where defendant was out of the state at the time of service of process.[28]

A default judgment may be rendered or entered at a special,[29] but not at an illegal,[30] term of court.

30. Ga.—Martin v. Scott, 44 S.E. 974, 118 Ga. 149.
34 C.J. p 183 note 28.

Where the summons and declaration are filed at a term which is not held by reason of the absence of the judge, a judgment by default may nevertheless be entered at the next succeeding term.[31] It has been held that the entry of a default judgment during a term at which the court has ordered the trial of criminal cases only is unauthorized;[32] but it has also been held that a statute providing for division of a term between civil and criminal business is for convenience in administration of the business of the court, and does not limit the jurisdiction of the court to enter a default judgment during the portion of the term allotted by statute to criminal business.[33] It is improper to enter a default judgment, under notice of trial for a certain term, when the case is reached under a note of issue for a prior term.[34]

e. Day and Hour

The terms of the statutes control in determining the day of the term on which a default judgment may regularly be rendered.

The terms of the statutes control in determining the day of the term on which a judgment by default may be regularly rendered.[35] As a general rule judgment may not be entered against defendant until a day after his default;[36] if he is summoned to appear and plead on the first day of the term, he may not be held in default and judgment entered against him until the next or a subsequent day;[37] but if the summons, although served the required number of days prior to the first day of the term, is made returnable at a subsequent day, judgment may be entered on the return day.[38] Where it is the custom to enter judgments as of the last day of the term, a judgment by default may be so entered, although the record shows that the default occurred on a previous day.[39]

Day of trial. In some jurisdictions where defendant is actually in default, judgment may be entered before the day on which the cause is set for trial,[40] or before the time at which the cause may regularly stand for trial,[41] or judgment may be entered notwithstanding the case has not been set for trial or placed on the trial docket.[42] In other jurisdictions judgment by default may not be entered before the day set for trial,[43] or before the case stands[44] or is set[45] for trial, but plaintiff is not deprived of his right to claim a default because he does not demand it until the time of trial.[46]

Hour of day. Where a party is cited to appear at a certain hour on a day named, judgment may not be taken against him at an earlier hour on the same day,[47] or at a later hour, if defendant appears at the hour set and the judge is not present;[48] and it is not mandatory on the court, on a party's failure to arrive at the exact hour set for trial, to proceed and render judgment by default;[49] but, under express statutory provision, judgment by default may be rendered at the hour specified in the citation for appearance and answer where defendant does not appear and answer at or before such time.[50]

f. In Vacation or at Chambers

A default judgment may be rendered or entered in vacation in pursuance of statutory authority, but not otherwise except in the case of an entry evidencing judicial action taken in term time.

Where the rendition of a judgment by default is to be performed as a judicial act by the court, or involves an application to the court, the judgment ordinarily must be rendered in term time and not in vacation;[51] and, where the time for defendant to plead expires in vacation, plaintiff must await the convening of the court at term.[52] However, when authorized to do so by statute, a judge may render a default judgment in vacation.[53] Also, a judgment by default may be entered after term time[54] by the judge where he has acted judicially and ordered the entry before adjournment.[55] Under some statutes, a judgment by default, under prescribed circumstances, may be entered by the clerk in vacation,[56] but as such a proceeding is in derogation of the common law, the statutory requirements must be strictly pursued.[57]

At chambers. In some jurisdictions a judgment by default may be rendered by the judge at chambers,[58] during a regular term;[59] but in other jurisdictions this practice is not allowed.[60]

§ 208. Application for Judgment

a. In general
b. Time and place of application
c. Notice of application

a. In General

An application to the court or clerk for a preliminary entry of default, or to the court for a final default judgment, is necessary when required by statute or rule of court or, in the case of final judgment, when judicial determination of a matter dependent on extrinsic proof, such as the amount of unliquidated damages, is necessary before rendition of judgment.

As a general rule, where extrinsic proof of any fact is required involving judicial determination to enable the court to assess the damages or take an account, or generally to render the judgment by default, or to carry it into effect, an application must first be made to the trial court, and such facts judicially ascertained before the judgment by default may be entered,[61] as where the claim or demand is for unliquidated damages,[62] or, generally, where the action is in tort,[63] unless the damages are liquidated;[64] and, although the action is in form ex contractu, if facts are alleged which constitute a tort, application must generally be made to the court before judgment by default may be entered.[65]

If in such a case judgment is entered by the clerk without a prior application to the court, the judgment, although irregular,[66] is sometimes held not void, but voidable merely,[67] although there is authority to the effect that it is absolutely void.[68] It is irregular for the court to render a judgment on a default, in the absence of both parties, and without application by plaintiff, at a time when it is regularly reached for trial,[69] notwithstanding plaintiff would be entitled to such a judgment, on application therefor.[70]

In many jurisdictions there are statutory provisions to the effect that a judgment by default may be entered by the clerk without a prior application to the court where, in an action on a contract express or implied, the nature of the action and of plaintiff's demand is such that there is no necessity for judicial action in determining the relief to be granted or the amount of the recovery, a common provision being that the clerk may enter such judgment in an action ex contractu for the recovery of money or of a certain or liquidated amount. Whether, under such a statute, the clerk may or may not enter a default judgment without a prior application to the court depends, of course, on whether the statute is or is not applicable to the particular case.[71] Under some statutes, it is the duty of the clerk, in one class of actions, to enter defendant's default on application by plaintiff and, in other actions, to enter such default without præcipe or application therefor.[72] A rule of court providing that, in all causes in which adverse counsel have appeared of record, no default judgment shall be rendered except on motion does not apply to a judgment which is not a default judgment.[73]

Judgment against self or codefendant. It has been held that defendant may not make a motion for a default judgment against himself[74] and that one defendant may not pray it against codefendants.[75]

Oral or written motion. Under a statute so providing, it is necessary for plaintiff or his counsel to appear in open court and ask for a preliminary default;[76] but the motion may be made either orally or in writing,[77] and it is sufficient if a written request for entry of default is filed with the clerk of court and read by him in open court.[78]

b. Time and Place of Application

An application for judgment by default, when one is necessary should be made at the proper time therefor.

The application should be made in the court where the action is pending at the time of default.

Where, as indicated supra subdivision a of this section, an application for judgment by default is required, the local statute or practice govern as to the time when the application should be made.[79] A motion based on the claim that affidavits to the pleas do not comply with a statute is too late where plaintiff has waived any and all rights he may have had at any time to judgment by default.[80] However, where the complaint is duly verified, but the answer is not, as required by statute, delay in moving for default judgment on the complaint for want of an answer is not, as a matter of law, a waiver of plaintiff's rights.[81] Also, failure of plaintiff to move promptly for judgment because of defendant's default in filing an answer in time does not work a discontinuance of the action.[82]

The application should be made in the court where the action is pending at the time of default;[83] if there has been a change of venue, before default, it should be made, not in the court where the action was commenced, but in the court to which the venue has been changed,[84] unless the change of venue was merely granted but never perfected,[85] or was made by stipulation between plaintiff and interveners only, and was not effective as to defendant.[86]

c. Notice of Application

Notice of an application for a default judgment is necessary only when required by statute or rule of court.

Under some statutory or practice rules, notice of the application for, or entry of, a judgment by default must be given to defendant;[87] but, unless so 34 C.J. p 185 note 82 [d] (1).

Purpose of court rule providing that any attorney intending to make a motion for a default order shall first serve on adverse party, if one required, a defendant who is once in court whether by legal process or by appearance is not entitled to such notice,[88] especially where the judgment is one which will be entered as a matter of course, as in an action for the payment of money only.[89] Such notice may be waived by defendant;[90] and the want of it, even when required, does not render the judgment void, but merely irregular.[91] A judgment by default without notice against a plaintiff at a term after the term at which he was dismissed from the case is void.[92]

Service of a motion for judgment on a clerk of an attorney for defendant is sufficient notice to defendant.[93] Certain procedure permitted by a local court rule has been held to be constructive notice to a defendant before the court that a motion for judgment by default will be entertained on failure of defendant to plead;[94] and, irrespective of such rule, plaintiff may give actual notice that on a day specified he will move for judgment unless an answer is filed on or before that time.[95]

§ 209. Bond or Recognizance on Taking Judgment

The execution of a bond, conditioned to save defendant harmless if he procures a vacation or modification of the judgment, is necessary, under a few statutes, before rendition of a judgment against a defendant who was constructively summoned and has not appeared.

Under some statutes, before the rendering of a judgment against an absent defendant who was constructively summoned, and did not appear, a bond or recognizance should be executed conditioned to save him harmless if he procures a vacation or modification of the judgment;[96] and a judgment rendered without such security is erroneous,[97] but not invalid.[98] Such a bond is not required, where an absent defendant was personally served with process,[99] or a defendant has appeared and no judgment is rendered against him,[1] or the interest of a defendant is identical with that of another defendant who appeared and asserted defenses.[2]

§ 210. Evidence

In order to justify the rendition of a default judgment for plaintiff, it is sometimes necessary to show that plaintiff appeared.

One of the matters to be shown, in order to justify the court in rendering judgment by default for plaintiff, under statutes relating to the proceeding has appeared or is known in the case, a copy of form of order he proposes to ask for, is to prevent entering of default orders through inadvertence, mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect of a party who has appeared in the case either personally or by an attorney, or of an attorney, who is known to represent litigants but who has not appeared, and rule should not be construed as making it a condition precedent to the entry of a default order that plaintiffs serve defendants with a copy of order when attorneys representing defendants have withdrawn and defendants have had ample time in which to substitute other attorneys, but have failed to do so, and have failed to inform plaintiffs of defendants' address.—Merryman v. Colonial Realty Co., 120 P.2d 230, 168 Or. 12.

(1) A rule of court that, in all causes in which adverse counsel have appeared of record, no default judgment shall be rendered except on the giving of at least three days' notice to such adverse party of the hearing of the motion for the judgment does not apply to a judgment which is not a default judgment.—Hamilton v. Bernstein, 299 P. 581, 133 Kan. 229.

(2) Where plaintiffs waived defendant's failure to answer by proceeding to introduce their evidence as though defendant were present in court and had announced ready for trial, statute requiring a three-day notice prior to hearing of application for default judgment was inapplicable.—Yeast v. Fleck, 121 P.2d 426, 58 Ariz. 469.

for the trial of right of property, is that plaintiff appeared.[3]

Proof of jurisdictional facts is discussed infra § 211, proof of default, infra § 212, and proof of the cause of action and amount recoverable, infra § 213.

§ 211. —— Proof of Jurisdictional Facts

Acquisition of jurisdiction over the person of defendant by service of process or voluntary appearance must be shown before the rendition or entry of judgment by default.

In order to sustain a judgment by default plaintiff must show that the court acquired jurisdiction over the person of defendant.[4] Except where there has been a voluntary appearance by defendant,[5] there must be proof of a proper service of process on defendant.[6] Ordinarily this proof is furnished by the officer's return[7] or by an affidavit of the person serving the writ, which must be made in due form in order to support the judgment.[8] An admission of service of the summons and complaint is not sufficient,[9] unless it states the manner in which the service was made;[10] and a written acknowledgment of service of process, indorsed on the writ, and purporting to be signed by defendant, will not be sufficient to support a judgment by default, without proof of the authenticity of the indorsement and signature.[11]

In case of service by publication on an absent or nonresident defendant, plaintiff must show a full compliance with all the requirements of the statute with regard to the mode of issuing and serving the process,[12] and also prove the facts which give the court jurisdiction over the property attached, or the res on which alone its judgment may operate,[13] unless the necessity for such proof is obviated by filing a statutory affidavit.[14]

A judgment rendered without sufficient proof of service of process has been held erroneous[15] and, according to some decisions, void.[16]

§ 212. —— Proof of Default

In many jurisdictions an affidavit or other extrinsic proof of a failure to plead within the time allowed by law is essential to a judgment by default.

In some jurisdictions, under the rule that the court will take judicial notice from its records as to whether an appearance has been entered or a plea filed,[17] an affidavit or other extrinsic proof of the default is not necessary before entering a default judgment for failure to appear and plead,[18] as

Examination by court of return
Court, on request for default judgment, is under duty to examine process and returns thereon, and determine whether process and manner of service was such as to give defendant notice required by law.—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Agnew, 155 So. 205, 170 Miss. 604.

Formal offer in evidence
There is no law requiring that, in confirming a default, the citation and return of the sheriff thereon be formally offered in evidence.—Stout v. Return filed after adjournment of term Filing summons in clerk's office with return showing service after adjournment of term at which default judgment was rendered is not proof of service or part of proceedings of court for rendition of judgment.—Hunsaker v. Watts, 257 Ill. App. 351.

Necessity of other evidence
(1) Where amended return of sheriff showed legal service on foreign corporation through local agent, default judgment was warranted without further showing or proof of agency, and burden of disproving agency was on defendant seeking to overthrow service.—Employer's Reinsurance Corporation v. Brock, Tex. Civ.App., 74 S.W.2d 435, error dismissed.

(2) However, where return of service of process, together with other parts of record, leaves any question of doubt or is not sufficiently explicit, court, before entering default judgment, has duty to hear, and to require to be produced, evidence showing that defendant was given notice required by law.—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Agnew, 155 So. 205, 170 Miss. 604.

Record only necessary proof
Where plaintiff made motion for preliminary default, the only proof necessary to show that defendant had made no appearance was record

where the default consists of the failure to obey a rule to plead,[19] although, where judgment is taken for want of a plea, the record must show that there was no plea filed,[20] and proof of service of the declaration may be necessary in order to ascertain whether the time within which defendant might plead has expired at the time of the entry of the default.[21]

In other jurisdictions in the ordinary case of defendant's omission to plead or answer within the time limited by law, plaintiff is required to make and file an affidavit[22] or submit other sufficient proof[23] that no plea or answer has been received or filed within the time allowed; and the sufficiency of such affidavit or proof,[24] and of the filing or service thereof,[25] depends on the requirements of the particular statute.

In order to justify the court in rendering judgment by default for plaintiff, under the statutes relating to the trial of right of property, it must be made to appear that defendant failed to appear or neglected or refused to join issue when directed.[26]

§ 213. —— Proof of Cause of Action

a. Necessity
b. Admissibility, weight, and sufficiency

a. Necessity

It is a general rule that, in order to be entitled to a judgment by default, plaintiff need not prove his cause of action or the allegations of his petition, declaration, or complaint, except as to damages where they are unliquidated.

In a few jurisdictions plaintiff is required to prove his cause of action in every case of default.[27] However, in most jurisdictions, since defendant's default in failing to plead or answer admits the material and traversable allegations of the declaration or complaint, as discussed supra § 201, if such declaration or complaint alleges a good cause of action and, when so required by statute, is duly verified, plaintiff, as a general rule, is not required, in order to be entitled to a judgment by default, to establish his cause of action by further proof,[28] except as to the amount of damages where they are unliquidated, as discussed in Damages § 163; but the nature of the action, or the circumstances of the particular case may, under some statutes, take it out of the general rule and require plaintiff to prove the facts essential to his recovery,[29] as where defendant was only constructively served with process,[30] as by publication,[31] or where the complaint was not served with the summons.[32] A failure to produce such proof, where required, does not render the judgment void, but merely erroneous.[33] An attempt to prove the allegations of the complaint unnecessarily does not affect plaintiff's right to the judgment,[34] or compel him to make a complete case;[35] nor does it affect statutory provisions regarding the effect of defendant's default.[36]

Quo warranto proceeding. In some jurisdictions, the state is entitled, without making proof of the facts set out in the petition or information, to a judgment of ouster against defendant in a quo warranto proceeding where he defaults by failing to appear or answer;[37] but in other jurisdictions proof must be made to sustain a judgment in case of default.[38]

Joint defendants. Where one of two joint defendants answers, controverting the material allegations of the declaration, the fact that the other defendant suffers default does not dispense with the necessity of proof as to the answering defendant;[39] and proof against those in default may be taken at the same time and on the trial of the issues against those defending and a judgment may be rendered on the whole case.[40]

Where there are several adverse claimants to the demand and one of them appears and prosecutes his claim, and the other fails to do so, and defendant interposes no defense, the party prosecuting may not take judgment by default, unless he shows by legal proof a right of recovery prima facie in himself.[41]

b. Admissibility, Weight, and Sufficiency

In so far as they are not varied by statute, general rules as to the admissibility and weight, and the sufficiency, of evidence are applicable where, on an application for a default judgment, proof of plaintiff's cause of action is required.

Where proof of the cause of action or of the amount of plaintiff's claim or demand is necessary, the general rules of evidence, in so far as they are not varied by statute, apply in a proceeding on an application for a default judgment with regard to the admissibility[42] and the weight and sufficiency[43] of the evidence. his allegations,[44] and must be sufficient to make out his case with legal certainty.[45] In the absence of statute prescribing the nature of the evidence, the judgment may be founded on any legal evidence which is sufficient to satisfy the court.[46] Under some statutes an affidavit in respect of plaintiff's claim or demand, if regularly and properly made, may be sufficient by itself to support the judgment;[47] but it is within the discretion of the court to require other or further proof.[48]

Evidence for defendant. As defendant by his default has admitted all the traversable facts which were properly pleaded in the declaration or complaint, as discussed supra § 201, he usually is not permitted on the hearing of an application for a default judgment to introduce any evidence controverting plaintiff's cause of action and his liability thereon;[49] but, as indicated in Damages § 172 b, he may, in a proceeding for the assessment of damages, offer evidence in mitigation or reduction of the damages claimed by plaintiff.

a. In general

b. Conformity to pleadings and proof

c. Amount

d. Attorney's fees

a. In General

The court may render judgment by default or deny the application therefor, continue the cause, and grant further time to plead. Where it renders judgment for plaintiff by default, the court may award such recovery or relief as is permissible and appropriate under the law and the facts.

A default judgment may properly be rendered without the aid of a jury[50] where a writ of inquiry is unnecessary;[51] and, under some statutes relating to particular classes of actions, a hearing is not a prerequisite to a default judgment;[52] but where the cause of action must be proved, as considered supra § 213, and the preliminary default must be confirmed, as discussed infra § 216, a confirmation of, or attempt to confirm, a preliminary default involves a trial of the case on the merits and on the issue joined by the preliminary default.[53] The sufficiency of the cause of action stated in the declaration or complaint is open for consideration;[54] and, where no cause of action is stated, it is proper for the court to dismiss the complaint.[55] The court

An executor who brought action on note was not an agent within meaning of statutory provision that, if all plaintiffs are absent from the state at time of bringing of suit, or if plaintiff is a corporation, affidavit or affirmation may be made by an agent of plaintiffs who will make further oath or affirmation that he has personal knowledge of the matters therein stated, and hence executor was not required to make oath or affirmation that he had personal knowledge of matters stated in affidavit.—Carey v. Howard, 16 A.2d 289, 178 Md. 512.

Basis of affidavit

Correctness of conclusion from facts

Whether pleader stated correct or incorrect conclusion from facts alleged was question for court's determination when judgment was entered.—Wright v. Shipman, Tex.Civ. App., 279 S.W. 296.

Unless clearly bad, complaint should be held sufficient.—Mihelich v., Butte Electric Ry. Co., 281 P. 540, 85 Mont. 604.

may disregard objections which are not jurisdictional, but amount to no more than mere irregularities.[56]

According to the facts, the court may either render a judgment by default, or confirm the entry thereof, and assess plaintiff's damages,[57] or it may set aside a preliminary entry of the default, as discussed infra § 333, or deny the application, and grant defendant further time to answer or otherwise plead.[58] Whether a default judgment shall be rendered in a proper case or some other permissible action taken rests largely in the court's discretion,[59] which is to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve the ends of substantial justice.[60] However, where by statute plaintiff is entitled to a default, the court may refuse it and continue the cause.[61] The refusal of the court to enter a default at one time does not estop it from granting a default at a subsequent time.[62]

Relief generally. In rendering judgment for plaintiff by default, the court may award any recovery or relief which is appropriate[63] and to which plaintiff is entitled under the facts alleged and relief demanded in his declaration or complaint,[64] but not relief which is not authorized by law.[65]

Judgment for defendant. If plaintiff's pleading states a good cause of action, and defendant fails to answer, it is error to give judgment for defendant;[66] at least affirmative relief may not be given in his favor as long as the default stands.[67] Even where plaintiff fails to appear, where defendant has pleaded only matter going to defeat plaintiff's cause of action, the remedy of defendant is to move for dismissal for want of prosecution,[68] and not to prove his defense and take a verdict and judgment in his favor.[69] A judgment in favor of defendant has, however, been sustained where required proof of the cause of action was not introduced and consequently a judgment against him would have been improper.[70]

Where defendant served by publication. Where a nonresident defendant is served by publication only, the proper judgment against him on his default is, not one in personam, but a judgment quasi in rem.[71] A judgment in personam in such a case is void.[72] If plaintiff fails to prove his cause of action, the only proper judgment is one dismissing the complaint.[73] It is not error not to appoint an attorney to represent one of two defendants who

b. Conformity to Pleadings and Proof

(1) In general
(2) As to relief

(1) In General

A default judgment must strictly conform to, and be supported by, the allegations of the petition or complaint.

A judgment for plaintiff by default must strictly[75] conform to, and be supported by, the allegations of the petition or complaint,[76] a closer correspondence between pleading and judgment being necessary than after a contested trial.[77] Defendant's default does not enlarge or broaden plaintiff's claim and rights under the allegations of the petition;[78] nor may the allegations of the petition be enlarged by any evidence offered or introduced on confirmation of the default judgment.[79] Where plaintiff proceeds under a statute requiring proof, and his own evidence shows that he has no cause of action, it is proper to render judgment in favor of defendant.[80]

(2) As to Relief

The relief granted plaintiff in a judgment by default must conform to, and be supported by, the allegations in the complaint, as well as by the proof in support of the allegations where such proof is required.

The relief granted plaintiff on a judgment by default must conform to, and be supported by, the allegations of the declaration or complaint,[81] and the proofs in support thereof,[82] where such proof is required, as discussed supra § 213; and it may not be any different from, or greater than, that which plaintiff has demanded in his complaint.[83] Plaintiff's relief in a judgment by default is strictly limited in nature and degree to that specifically demanded in the complaint,[84] even though the allega-

Filing of demurrer is not the making of a "defense" within the meaning of the statute providing that, if no "defense" is made, plaintiff may not have judgment for any relief not specifically demanded.—Union Light, Heat & Power Co. v. City of Bellevue, 144 S.W.2d 1046, 284 Ky. 405.

tions[85] or the proofs,[86] or both,[87] would justify other, additional, or greater relief, as under a prayer for general relief.[88]

According to some authorities a default judgment for relief different from, or greater than, that demanded is void;[89] but according to others it is merely erroneous or voidable.[90] If the complaint states a cause of action sufficient to sustain the relief actually given, the judgment will not be held invalid because the complaint also states facts authorizing other relief;[91] and it has been held, on the theory, that the allegations and not the prayer in a petition should control such a judgment,[92] that the judgment is not void because the relief afforded was not specifically prayed for.[93]

Where the complaint is amended, and defendant does not answer either the original or the amended complaint, he may not object that the relief granted under the amended complaint is greater than that demanded in the original complaint,[94] unless the amendment is made without notice to him.[95]

Award of damages to defendant. It is error to award damages to defendant where, although plaintiff defaults by failing to appear at the time set for trial, no issue as to damages to defendant has been raised in the pleadings.[96]

c. Amount

A default judgment may be rendered for the amount claimed in the complaint, but not for a greater amount. It should not include interest unless interest is demanded in the complaint.

A judgment by default may be rendered for the amount claimed in the complaint,[97] less amounts received in payment in the meantime,[98] unless the case has been compromised for a smaller sum,[99] or unless evidence is required and a prima facie case made for the full amount claimed is destroyed in whole or in part by other evidence.[1] Judgment should not be rendered for an amount greater than that prayed for in the declaration or complaint,[2] or justified by the facts alleged,[3] although the evidence shows a larger amount.[4] The fact that a part of the claim is barred by the statute of limitations does not render a default judgment for the whole illegal.[5]

Interest. Except to the extent that interest is demanded in the complaint,[6] interest should not be included in the judgment;[7] and, even where interest is allowed, it should not be allowed for more than the legal rate.[8] Under some statutes, the clerk of the court, in entering a default judgment, is authorized to compute and allow interest if the complaint asks for a certain sum with interest;[9] but this does not invalidate a judgment, the interest on which is computed by the court.[10]

sential to the allowance of attorney's fees to plaintiff on the rendition of a default judgment in his favor.

A default judgment for plaintiff may include attorney's fees where the petition brings the case within a statute imposing liability for such fees on defendant;[11] but, as a general rule, plaintiff will not, in the absence of statute, be entitled to an allowance for attorney's fees,[12] except where the suit is on a written instrument containing a stipulation for the payment of an attorney's fee, in which case the judgment rendered on defendant's default may include the amount of such fee as well as the principal sum of plaintiff's demand,[13] and even in such case the allowance of the fee is subject to the discretion of the court,[14] and the fee may be disallowed in a proper case.[15]

Costs generally where judgment is by default are discussed in Costs § 70.

§ 215. Form and Requisites of Judgment

A default judgment must comply with general requirements as to the form and contents of judgments, except in so far as the statutes and rules of practice govern the rendition and entry of such judgments.

The essentials to the existence, validity, and regularity of judgments generally, as discussed supra §§ 13–61, and the general requirements as to the form and contents of judgments, as considered supra §§ 62–86, apply to judgments by default,[16] except in so far as special statutes and rules of practice govern the rendition and entry of such judgments,[17] and, even in such a case, although it is preferable that the entry be made in the language of the statute,[18] it is not essential that any set form be followed, a substantial compliance with the statutory requirements being sufficient.[19] The judgment rendered must pronounce the true sentence of the law,[20] and must be definite and certain as to its terms,[21] and as to the amount of the recovery;[22] and must be more than a mere order that judgment be entered.[23] Where the judgment is given against a defendant absent from the state, it should direct plaintiff to comply with the statutory provisions which in such a case are necessary to entitle him to execution.[24] The judgment should be properly docketed or filed;[25] but, if it is duly rendered, the fact that it is not entered on the record does not affect its validity as against defendant, if it is so entered before any action is taken by him.[26]

Designation of parties. The judgment must designate the parties for and against whom it is rendered;[27] and the names of the parties appearing in the judgment must correspond with those in the pleadings and process,[28] the ordinary rules as to variance in this respect being applicable.[29]

Separate judgments or findings. Where distinct suits are brought, separate judgments by default must be rendered therein, although the suits arise out of the same subject matter and the parties are identical in all,[30] unless they are consolidated.[31] The rule which requires the court sitting as a jury to find separately facts and conclusions of law, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Trial § 624, also 64 C.J. p 1244 note 72, does not apply in rendering a judgment by default against one of several defendants.[32] It has been held that there was only one judgment and one final determination of the rights and liabilities of all the parties, although that part of the final determination relating to defaulting defendants was reached on a certain day and another part relating to the remaining defendant was reached on a later day.[33]

§ 216. —— Final or Interlocutory

Subject to statutory variation, a default judgment against the defendant in an action against him ordinarily may be, and is, interlocutory or final according-ly as some act does or does not remain to be done.

A judgment by default is either interlocutory or final;[34] and where it is not shown that it was intended to be final the tendency is to hold it to be interlocutory.[35] Under the statutes of some jurisdictions, as considered supra § 206, a final judgment cannot be entered immediately on a default; there must first be a preliminary entry of the default. The judgment is final where the record is such that no such inquiry or act is necessary,[36] but a judgment by default against one of several defendants ordinarily is interlocutory[37] and not final[38] until the conclusion of the case against the other defendants,[39] although it may be final where defendants are sued jointly and severally, and, prior to the judgment, the action was discontinued as to the other defendants.[40]

The judgment is interlocutory where a writ of inquiry must be issued thereon, or some other act done involving a future inquiry to determine the amount of recovery.[41] Generally a final judgment need not and cannot be entered where the damages are unliquidated or the amount of plaintiff's claim is uncertain or indeterminate;[42] there may or must first

Terminology

(1) The interlocutory judgment referred to in practice act provision relating to assessment of damages on entry of interlocutory judgment by default is the equivalent of a judgment by default under the ancient practice, and is ordinarily considered a judgment notwithstanding it may fall short of an actual judgment in the strictly technical sense.—Edelstein v. Hub Loan Co., 33 A.2d 829, 130 N.J.Law 511.

(2) A simple or naked default is not a substantial right, nor a final determination of cause of action, but simply a finding by the court that plaintiff is entitled to default on record.—Weinhart v. Meyer, 247 N.W. 811, 215 Iowa 1317.

(3) Under some statutes the preliminary entry made by an answering defendant who defaults by failing to appear at the trial is, and should be, termed a decision rather than a judgment.—Hathaway v. Wilson, 161 A. 234, 52 R.I. 447—Gregson v. Superior Court, 128 A. 221, 46 R.I. 362.

Distinction

"Judgment by default final" is distinguished from "judgment by default and inquiry," in that former establishes allegations of complaint and concludes by way of estoppel, while latter establishes right of action in plaintiff of kind stated in complaint, precise character and extent of which remain to be determined by hearing in damages and final judgment thereon.—De Hoff v. Black, 175 S.E. 179, 206 N.C. 687, followed in Akins v. Black, 175 S.E. 181, 206 N.C. 691.

be an interlocutory judgment by default,[43] and the final judgment is entered after the damages have been assessed on a writ of inquiry or otherwise determined according to law.[44] On the other hand, where plaintiff's claim is liquidated or certain in amount, so that he is entitled to recover that amount, if anything at all, final judgment may be at once entered on default.[45] If a part of the declaration or complaint is unanswered, plaintiff may have an interlocutory judgment as to such part, but final judgment cannot be entered until the issues are tried and determined.[46]

Confirmation. In some jurisdictions a preliminary or interlocutory judgment entered on a default must be confirmed by the court, before it can have the effect of a final judgment;[47] but in other jurisdictions, when a judgment by default is properly entered by the clerk or a commissioner, in final form, it is regarded as the judgment of the court, as discussed supra § 205, and confirmation by the court is not necessary.[48]

Directing judgment. In some jurisdictions it is proper for the court, on entering an interlocutory judgment, to direct what final judgment shall be entered,[49] or to direct that the final judgment shall be settled by the court or a referee,[50] or that the damages be assessed by a jury.[51]

Lapse of time as making final. Under some statutes, a default judgment becomes final after the expiration of a prescribed period of time,[52] unless defendant pleads[53] or a motion for a new trial is filed[54] in the meantime, or unless the case is continued at plaintiff's instance.[55]

§ 217. —— Recitals and Record

Where there is a judgment by default, the judgment should contain appropriate recitals of the facts on which it is based, and the judgment roll or record should contain whatever is required by statute to be included therein.

vide what the judgment roll or record in case of judgments by default shall contain there should be a compliance therewith.[57] The record of the judgment imports verity of the facts recited;[58] but a recital in the judgment of a fact is not proof thereof, where the contrary appears from the records of the court.[59]

Jurisdictional facts. The judgment or record must disclose facts which show that the court had jurisdiction in the case,[60] such as that process or notice had been duly and properly issued and served on defendant,[61] and that all facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction had been proved,[62] or that defendant had acknowledged or waived service and voluntarily appeared.[63] However, a failure to recite such facts in the judgment does not invalidate it, if they sufficiently appear in the record;[64] and a mere showing that proof of service of summons is absent from the judgment roll several years after the entry of judgment is insufficient to defeat the judgment,[65] especially where filing of due proof of service is recited in the judgment itself and in the records of the court, and is stated in an affidavit of the attorney at whose instance the judgment was entered.[66] The judgment need not recite that defendant had been called.[67] Where the service of process was constructive only, as by publication, the judgment itself or the record should affirmatively show a full compliance with the statute authorizing such service,[68] and if the record shows service of an insufficient notice it will not be presumed that another sufficient notice was served.[69]

Default. The judgment should recite facts sufficient to show affirmatively that defendant was in default, and for what reason, whether for want of an appearance, for want of a plea, or otherwise,[70] and not merely that plaintiff claimed the default or moved for the entry;[71] and if the record shows a judgment without a lawful default the judgment is void on the face of the record.[72]

Proof of cause of action. Where plaintiff is required to produce or file proof of his cause of action before the judgment can be entered, discussed supra § 213, the record or the recitals of the judgment should show a compliance with this requirement;[73] and under some statutes, where service is

Sufficient recital of trial of issues

Where a statute provides that parties to an issue of fact shall be deemed to have waived a jury trial by failing to appear at the trial, judgment reciting that defendant, although filing answer, failed to appear when case was called for trial, and that thereupon plaintiff waived jury and submitted his case to court on pleadings and proof adduced, is not void on its face as not showing a trial of the issues raised by the pleadings.—Goffstein v. Presumption from recital

Where recitals in judgment are that plaintiff has made due proof of

by publication, and no answer is filed, a statement of the evidence must be filed as a part of the record;[74] but in the absence of statute the evidence need not be reduced to writing and preserved with the record.[75]

Assessment of damages. If an assessment of damages is necessary, the judgment should recite the fact that the assessment had been made,[76] but it need not state explicitly that the assessment was made by the court;[77] and the record need not show that the interest was computed by the clerk.[78] The judgment will be held erroneous where the record shows that the judge acted on a certificate of the clerk in lieu of a writ of inquiry and does not show a compliance with statutory conditions to a default judgment without a writ of inquiry.[79]

Findings. Unnecessary findings form no part of the judgment roll in case of a default judgment,[80] and their incompleteness does not vitiate the judgment.[81]

§ 218. Office Judgments

Under the statutes of a few states, the clerk of court, on defendant's default, enters a conditional judgment, known as an office judgment, which is confirmed at a subsequent date and becomes final at a still later date.

Under some statutes, if defendant defaults at the rules, to which a writ or summons issued against him is returnable,[82] and plaintiff has duly filed his declaration,[83] a conditional judgment, known as an office judgment, may be entered against him by the clerk of the court, by what is known as a common order,[84] which may be confirmed at the next succeeding rules.[85] If the "common order" and "common order confirmed" were regularly taken, the cause is properly on the office judgment docket at the next term of the court,[86] and if the case is one in which an order for an inquiry of damages is not necessary or made, unless defendant appears in the meantime and demurs, pleads, or otherwise makes defense to the action,[87] the office judgment becomes final, so as to bar a defense, on such day of the next succeeding term of court as is fixed by statute,[88] except where the statutory number of days has not elapsed after the service of process,[89] in which case it becomes final at the term next succeeding the expiration of such time.[90] However, where the case is one in which an inquiry of damages is proper, an order therefor should be made and the office judgment does not become final so as to bar a defense thereafter, without the intervention of the court or a jury,[91] and defendant may his claim, presumption exists that legal and sufficient evidence was before court.—Aycock v. Miller, La. App., 18 So.2d 335—Goldman v. Thomson, 8 La.App. 469.

Proceedings after judgment becomes final
All proceedings in action at law after office judgment becomes final are nullity or should be set aside, so as to give plaintiff benefit of judgment, if proceedings are regular and plaintiff's rights have not been waived.—Carney v. plead to issue at any time before the order for inquiry of damages is executed.[92]

Waiver. Plaintiff may waive the benefit of such statute so as to prevent the office judgment from becoming final by operation of the statute,[93] and it cannot thereafter become final until it is entered up as the judgment of the court.[94]

Affidavits or proof. Under some statutes final judgment cannot be entered up for plaintiff, in an action for the recovery of money arising out of contract until he, his agent, or his attorney has filed an affidavit stating the amount he believes to be due him, or proved his case in open court.[95] Such affidavit may be filed at any time before judgment is entered,[96] except that if plaintiff desires to prevent defendant from filing a plea without affidavit he must file his affidavit before the plea is filed.[97] If plaintiff has filed such an affidavit, no plea can be filed by defendant unless he files therewith, as required by statute, an affidavit denying that any sum is due from him to plaintiff, or stating that the amount due is less than that stated by plaintiff,[98] or unless plaintiff waives the benefit of such requirement.[99]

IX. JUDGMENT ON MOTION OR SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS

§ 219. In General

Judgment on motion or in a summary proceeding is permissible in some instances at common law and in cases covered by statutes providing therefor.

The common law admits of a judgment on motion or a summary proceeding for judgment in a few instances,[1] such as in case of contempt of court, as is discussed in Contempt § 62, or in a case to compel an attorney to pay money over to his client, as is discussed in Attorney and Client § 159; and, where funds in the custody of a court are lent out by order of the court, the borrower's obedience to an order requiring the return of the money may be enforced by a judgment entered against him on a mere motion.[2] In most instances, however, such a remedy is regarded as being in derogation of the common law, and exists only under the authority of statutory enactments,[3] which in some jurisdictions provide in certain cases for a special summary proceeding for judgment on notice and motion,[4] and in other jurisdictions provide that, after issue is joined by the pleadings in certain kinds of actions, summary judgment for either party may be had on motion where the moving party substantiates his claim or defense by affidavit and the other party fails to show the existence of triable issues of fact warranting a trial.[5]

Record

It is not necessary to make the facts proved, or the evidence, a part of the record, in case of a judgment by default; and if any part of the evidence is referred to in the judgment, this of itself is insufficient to preclude the fact that other evidence might have been heard by the court, unless it affirmatively appears from the record that this was all the evidence heard by the court.—Anderson v. History

"In a general way, our summary judgment statute traces its origin to the English Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67, passed in 1855. . . . In the United States provisions similar to the English rules have been adopted in a number of states, either by statute or by rule of court. Whenever variations are found, they are traceable to local conditions or judicial structure. An examination of the so-called summary judgment laws both in England and in this country shows that the purpose of such laws was to regulate procedure, and not to create a new right in fa-

Statutes providing for judgment on motion in certain cases have generally been held valid,[6] and it has been held that, although they should not be extended by construction,[7] they should be liberally construed to effectuate their purpose.[8] The power given to grant a summary judgment must be exercised with care, and not be extended beyond its just limits,[9] and before a party is entitled to the benefit of such a statutory remedy he should bring himself squarely within the spirit and letter of the statute,[10] and everything pertaining to the entry of such a judgment must be done strictly according to the provision which authorizes it.[11] The remedy is to be administered in the furtherance of justice.[12] vor of a party plaintiff. They were adopted to grant relief against procedural tactics interposed for delay and not to substitute a new method of trial where an issue of fact exists."—Fisher v. Sun Underwriters Ins. Co. of New York, 179 A. 702, 704, 705, 55 R.I. 175, 103 A.L.R. 1097.

"At common law, although false and sham pleas could be stricken out, the general issue could not be inquired into and eliminated. A defendant had the right to plead the general issue and thereby put the plaintiff to his proof, irrespective of whether or not he actually had a defense to the claim made against him."—Fisher v. Sun Underwriters Ins. Co. of New York, supra.

Actions commenced prior to enactment

Such a statutory provision, being remedial, applies to actions commenced prior to the date of its enactment.—General Inv. Co. v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 193 N.Y.S. 903, 200 App.Div. 794, affirmed 139 N.E. 216, 235 N.Y. 133—Peninsular Transp. Co. v. Greater Britain Ins. Co., Ltd., 193 N.Y.S. 885, reversed on other grounds 193 N.Y.S. 886, 200 App.Div. 695.

Alleged defects in summary judgment law preventing subpœnaing of adverse parties by defendant and not requiring plaintiff's and defendant's affidavits to be of same particularity could not be urged by party not injured thereby.—People's Wayne County Bank v. Wolverine Box Co., 230 N.W. 170, 250 Mich. 273, 69 A.L.R. 1024.

Claims under veterans' legislation

However, it has been held that a state statute providing for summary judgment based on complaint and affidavits in support of motion for judgment without examination of facts is repugnant to Tucker Act, which manifests congressional intent that claims under World War veterans' legislation should not be treated in a summary manner.—U. S. v. Lindholm, C.C.A.Cal., 79 F.2d 784, 103 A.L.R. 213, followed in U. S. v. Stevenson, 79 F.2d 788.

Consistency with other provisions

Rules of Civil Practice, rule 113, providing that an answer in certain actions may be struck out, and judgment entered thereon, on motion, and the affidavit of plaintiff, or any other person having knowledge of the facts, justifying the cause of action, and stating the amount claimed, and his belief that there is no defense to the action, unless defendant shall show facts sufficient to entitle him to defend, is not inconsistent with Civ.Prac. Act § 422, providing that an issue of fact arises on an allegation, contained in an answer, that defendant has no sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief with respect to a material allegation of the complaint, § 423, providing that an "issue of fact must be tried as prescribed in this article" (§§ 421–471), and § 425, providing that, in an action in which a complaint demands a judgment for a sum of money only, an issue of fact must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived.—Hanna v. Nature and purpose of statutes. Statutes in some jurisdictions permitting the filing of a notice of motion for judgment in lieu of filing a declaration in an action at law are intended to give plaintiff a simpler, cheaper, and more expeditious mode of procedure than is provided by a regular common-law action.[13] Other statutes providing for summary judgment in actions instituted in the normal manner where no triable issue of fact is disclosed after consideration of affidavits of the parties are intended to further the prompt administration of justice,[14] and expedite litigation[15] by avoiding needless trials;[16] and they enable a party speedily to obtain a judgment by preventing the interposition of unmeritorious defenses for purposes of delay.[17] The object of the proceedings provided by such statutes is to determine whether a defense genuinely exists[18] and whether there is an issue of fact warranting submission of the case to the jury.[19] On the other hand, such statutes were not intended to furnish an easy medium to plaintiff by which he might avoid the inconvenience and uncertainty of a trial; they do not provide a new method for the consideration and determination by the court of questions of law in advance of a trial on the facts contrary to established practice[20] or provide a substitute for existing methods in the determination of issues of fact.[21] Moreover, the statutory procedure for judgment on motion was not intended as a test for the sufficiency of pleadings[22] or to supplant a demurrer or motion to make pleadings more definite and certain.[23]

§ 220. Cases in Which Allowed

a. In general
b. Particular actions
c. As determined by issues

a. In General

As a general rule, summary judgment on motion will be granted only in cases or under circumstances clearly covered by the statute or court rule, and, where it is so provided, the remedy is available to both the plaintiff and the defendant, on original causes of action or counterclaims, and judgment may be obtained for part of a claim.

Except in so far as such remedy is permitted by the common law, a summary judgment on motion will be granted only in cases, or under circumstances, covered by the terms of the statute or court rule.[24] The statutes generally limit summary procedure to simple cases,[25] where the moving party's right to judgment is clear and free from doubt.[26]

In action to vacate an order on ground that it is unlawful or unreasonable, as on appeal from revocation of architect's license, no motion for summary judgment is necessary, and there is no occasion to supplement the record by affidavits filed by both parties to support motions for summary judgment.—Kuehnel v. Wisconsin Registration Board of Architects and Professional Engineers, 9 N.W.2d 630, 243 Wis. 188.

Costs

The provision of municipal court code that, within limits of jurisdiction defined in the code, the court shall have power to render any judgment that is consistent with a case made by the pleadings and embraced within the issues, does not authorize the granting of summary judgment against a party who has failed to pay costs assessed against him in a prior action.—Ebel v. Ast, 21 N.Y.S.2d 768, appeal granted 23 N.Y.S.2d 476, 260 App.Div. 870.

Validity of cause of action

The validity or invalidity of the cause of action on which the motion for summary judgment was made depends on the facts existing at the time the action was commenced, or, at least, at the time the motion was made.—Poritzky v. Wachtel, 27 N.Y.S.2d 316, 176 Misc. 633.

Whether a case is of such a nature as to permit application of the statutory procedure rests largely in the trial judge's discretion.[27] The statutory remedy of summary judgment where no triable issue is shown to exist is available to defendant as well as to plaintiff,[28] but defendant's remedy is generally limited to the kinds of actions in which plaintiff could have secured such judgment,[29] except to the extent that the statute permits defendant to move for summary judgment in other actions.[30]

Counterclaims. As a general rule, summary judgment procedure is applicable to defendant's counterclaims as well as to original actions, so that either party may move with respect to the same as though the counterclaim were an independent action.[31] Where the statute authorizes summary judgment only in certain kinds of actions, as is discussed infra subdivision b of this section, the counterclaim must be based on a cause of the kind specified,[32] but, if it is of such a kind, summary judgment may be obtained even though the main action is not of the kind in which summary judgment could be granted.[33]

Partial judgment. Under some statutes or court rules, if it appears that defendant's defense applies only to a part of plaintiff's claim, or admits a part of it, plaintiff may have judgment on motion for so much of his claim as such defense does not apply to[34] or as is admitted without qualification;[35] and such recovery may be had where the amount is ad-

Where case does not fall within any of the eight classes specifically enumerated in first paragraph of rule of civil practice governing summary judgment, defendants' authority to move for summary judgment may be found in the paragraph governing summary judgment where defense founded on facts established prima facie by documentary evidence or official record.—Levine v. Behn, 25 N.E.2d 871, 282 N.Y. 120—Lederer v. Wise Shoe Co., 12 N.E.2d 544, 276 N.Y. 459, 852, disapproving Felberose Holding Corporation v. Severing cause of action

The severing of first cause of action and granting summary judgment on second cause of action was improper, where amount of damages under second cause of action might affect defendant's liability under first cause of action, and the whole claim should be considered at one time.—Cavagnaro v. Defense enabling delay in recovery

A plaintiff may recover judgment forthwith where defendant admits that he has no defense on merits to

mitted to be due on the same transaction which forms the basis of plaintiff's claim, notwithstanding the admission of liability is predicated on a cause of action different from that alleged in the complaint, or on different terms concerning the same type of action.[36] However, a motion for partial judgment must be denied where the amount due is disputed[37] or where the amount tendered by defendant was not accepted.[38] If defendant's motion for summary judgment applies only to one or more of several causes of action or to one or more of several parties plaintiff, and his contentions are sufficient to dispose of the claims of the complaint in such part, defendant may have final judgment forthwith dismissing the complaint to the extent warranted, and the action may be severed;[39] but defendant is not entitled to partial summary judgment for certain alleged items of damage set forth in the complaint where only a single cause of action is alleged and other items of damage remain for determination.[40]

b. Particular Actions

(1) In general
(2) Liquidated or unliquidated claims

(1) In General

The remedy of summary judgment is available only in the kinds of actions provided for by the statute or court rule, and, within limitations, such provisions usually extend to actions at law or equity, and to causes based on contract.

Generally the remedy of summary judgment is available only in such actions as are within the terms of the statute or court rule.[41] If the statute so provides, summary judgment may be granted in actions at law[42] or in equity,[43] but the action must be otherwise one permitted by the statute, as where the remedy is further restricted to liquidated demands, as is discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, and under some statutes the remedy is not available in equitable actions other than those particularly specified.[44] The statutes usually apply part of plaintiff's claim, although he may have a defense which might enable him to defeat recovery on the cause of action stated and to delay recovery even for the part of the claim which defendant is admittedly bound to pay immediately.—Fieder v. Itkin, 60 N.E.2d 753, 294 N.Y. 77.

Alternative procedural remedy
The code section, extending right to proceed by motion for judgment in all cases where action at law of any kind would lie, includes alternative procedural remedy to common-law action of ejectment, that is, petition to establish boundary lines, which partakes of legal nature of such action and is governed much by like legal principles and rules.—Pickeral v. Action not within rule
(1) An action for specific performance of a contract, under which defendant allegedly agreed that on plaintiff's return from the armed forces defendant would return to plaintiff the taxi business which had been transferred to defendant, was not an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale and purchase of specific property or to recover possession of a specific chattel which could be disposed of on motion for summary judgment.—Bennett v. Ritchie, 55 N.Y.S.2d 820, 269 App.Div. 851.

(2) The statutes do not comprehend actions to compel specific performance of an alleged agreement of an insurer to reinstate a policy terminated by failure of plaintiff to pay premiums.—Liss v. Continental Casualty Co., 284 N.Y.S. 304, 245 App. Div. 670.

where the sum sought to be recovered is a sum of money other than a penalty.[56]

On the other hand, summary judgment procedure has been held inapplicable to special proceedings,[57] such as mandamus,[58] an action against a state in the court of claims,[59] or summary proceedings by a landlord to recover possession of premises,[60] or in actions or proceedings for a declaratory judgment,[61] to partition realty,[62] to quiet title,[63] to establish a claim against a decedent's estate,[64] to have a trustee's compensation determined,[65] to recover attorney's fees,[66] or to levy on the earnings or income of a judgment debtor.[67] Summary judgment under a state statute is not authorized in suits in the federal courts on claims under veterans' legislation.[68]

(2) Liquidated or Unliquidated Claims

The statutes or court rules authorizing summary judgment usually apply to actions to recover a debt or liquidated demand arising on a contract or judgment and are sometimes restricted to such actions, but some provisions also authorize the remedy in suits to recover on an unliquidated claim.

The statutes or court rules authorizing the entry of judgment on motion where no triable issue is raised in response to the affidavits of the moving party usually apply to actions to recover a debt or liquidated demand arising on a contract express or implied in fact or in law,[69] or arising on a judgment for a stated sum.[70] The words "debt" or "liquidated demand" as used in the statutes are not to be given a constricted interpretation, although they should not be stretched to include a cause of action outside the main purpose of the enactment.[71] The suit ordinarily must be one founded on express or implied contract to pay a sum which is certain or readily reducible to certainty,[72] and, while it has been held that proceedings for summary judgment are applicable in any action in which recovery is sought under the indebitatus counts,[73] they are not applicable in every action in assumpsit.[74] Some statutes do not extend the summary judgment procedure to an action for unliquidated damages,[75] even though no defense is disclosed by the answer;[76] but other statutes or court rules make the remedy available in an action to recover an unliquidated debt or demand for a sum of money arising on express or implied contract.[77]

c. As Determined by Issues

(1) In general
(2) On motion by defendant
(3) Particular causes and issues

(1) In General

Under statutes and court rules authorizing summary judgment where affidavits are tendered in support of the claim and the opposing party fails to present facts establishing a triable issue, the court will grant the motion if no such issue is disclosed, even though the answer presents a counterclaim; but it will deny the motion if a triable issue of fact is raised as to a valid defense even though such defense is not properly pleaded.

Under various statutes and court rules authorizing summary judgment where the moving party files an affidavit in support of his claim or defense and the opposing party fails to present any facts giving rise to any triable issue or defense, the right to judgment depends on the nonexistence of a genuine issue warranting a trial,[78] and not merely on

Demand for sum of money

(1) Motions for judgment will be entertained only for the recovery of money based on contract.—Mountain State Water Co. v. Town of Kingwood, 1 S.E.2d 395, 121 W.Va. 66.

(2) A mandate proceeding to compel payment of pension to fireman's widow, when pension trustees had refused to recognize widow's right, was not a "demand for a sum of money only" within statute governing summary judgment.—Loveland v. City of Oakland, 159 P.2d 70, 69 Cal.App.2d 399.

Basis of recovery

Generally the basis for "assumpsit" is not recovery under a contract, but recovery of damages for a contract's breach, while a "notice of motion for judgment" is for recovery of money due under and by virtue of a contract.—City of Moundsville v. Brown, 25 S.E.2d 900, 125 W.Va. 779.

Other statements of rule

(1) Summary judgment should not be entered where the trial judge would have to decide controverted questions of fact.—Security Discount Corporation v. Jackson, 51 N.E.2d 618, 320 Ill.App. 440.

(2) Summary judgment may not be granted where the conclusion depends on varying inferences to be drawn from the facts.—Krauss v. Central Ins. Co. of Baltimore, 40 N. Y.S.2d 736.

(3) To warrant a summary judgment, there must be a failure on the part of defendant to satisfy the court that there is any basis for his denial or any truth in his defense, and unless the defendant fails so to do, the case should proceed to trial. —Grady v. Easley, 114 P.2d 635, 45 Cal.App.2d 632.

(4) Judgment may be rendered against defendant only as result of conclusion of law from facts found or not disputed.—Persky v. Bank of America Nat. Ass'n, 185 N.E. 77, 261 N.Y. 212.

Several defenses

Where defendant shows that under any one of several defenses genuine and substantial issue is created, he is entitled to trial, and summary judgment is improper.—American Surety Co. of New York v. Empire Trust Co., 217 N.Y.S. 673, 128 Misc. 116.

defendant having no interest other than that of self-protection,[89] or where the allegations and proof adduced by plaintiff are insufficient as a matter of law to warrant recovery.[90] Likewise plaintiff's motion for summary judgment will be denied where the interests of justice require that the controversy be disposed of on a trial rather than on the motion,[91] as where there is a real question as to a matter of law which could not be determined without a full and authoritative determination of the facts by a trial.[92] If the facts on which the application for summary judgment is based are exclusively within the knowledge of the moving party, or clearly not within the knowledge of the opponent, the relief requested will be denied;[93] but it must appear that the lack of knowledge is genuine, and if the facts are matters of public record or are otherwise fully available to the opposing party, his plea of lack of knowledge will be without force.[94]

On the other hand, a motion for a summary judgment may be allowed where plaintiff has sufficiently shown or verified his claim or demand and it satisfactorily appears that there is no real issue of fact to be determined between the parties,[95] or that there

Complicated case

An answered case that presents actually disputed and complicated facts subject to different interpretation, or abstruse questions of law, should proceed to an orderly and authoritative determination of the facts by trial and should not be summarily determined on motion for summary judgment, even though what appears to be question of fact may ultimately resolve itself into a question of law.—Minuto v. Indorser's denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to holder's allegations of due presentment, protest, and notice, coupled with denial of receipt of notice, was sufficient to warrant denial of motion for summary judgment and to require holder to prove its cause of action, where indorser was not shown and could not be expected to have any actual knowledge of protest.—Asbury Park & Ocean Grove Bank v. clearly is no substantial defense to the action,[96] or that the defense alleged is clearly a sham or frivolous,[97] even though it is necessary to decide an important question of law.[98] So it has been held that, where the question raised is wholly one of law, the determination of such question on a motion for summary judgment is proper.[99]

Effect of counterclaim. It has been held that the remedy of summary judgment may be available to plaintiff on his cause of action even where the answer sets up a counterclaim,[1] and that, if the counterclaim is plausible, judgment may be granted for plaintiff with a stay of execution until trial of the counterclaim;[2] but it has been held improper to grant summary judgment where valid counterclaims are pleaded for sums exceeding the damages de-

Conflicting motions

Where plaintiff made a motion for summary judgment on ground that there was no defense to the action, and defendant in opposition did not indicate existence of triable issues of fact and made a motion that summary judgment should be granted dismissing complaint, sole issue to be determined by the court was one of law.—Schifter v. Commercial Travelers Mut. Accident Ass'n of America, 50 N.Y.S.2d 376, 183 Misc. 74, affirmed 54 N.Y.S.2d 408, 269 App. Div. 706.

However, it has been held that a counterclaim predicating good and substantial cause justifying trial constitutes insuperable objection to summary judgment for plaintiff.—Bank of U. S. v. Slifka, 264 N.Y.S. 204, 148 Misc. 60—Wilkinson v. Halliwell Electric Co., 204 N.Y.S. 854, 123 Misc. 250.

manded by plaintiff.[3] Plaintiff may be entitled to summary judgment with respect to the counterclaim itself if no triable issue is raised in response to his defense thereto,[4] but his motion will be denied if issues are raised requiring determination at a trial.[5]

Sufficiency of pleadings. On a motion for summary judgment on a claim or defense on the ground that no triable issue of fact is raised, the decisive issue is not the sufficiency of the opposing party's pleadings,[6] for, if defective pleadings disclose a triable issue, they may be amended at or before the trial, and the motion for summary judgment should be denied;[7] but an amended pleading merely restating in different form sham allegations set forth in an earlier pleading will not defeat the motion.[8]

(2) On Motion by Defendant

Where the defendant's affidavits show that his denials or defenses are sufficient to defeat the plaintiff, or that his cause of action on a counterclaim warrants recovery, summary judgment for the defendant may be entered with respect to the plaintiff's cause of action or the defendant's counterclaim, if the plaintiff by affidavit fails to establish triable issues of fact.

As is discussed supra subdivision a of this section, the statutes and court rules permit defendant to move for summary judgment with respect to plaintiff's cause of action or with respect to his own counterclaims. Accordingly, where defendant's affidavits establish his contentions and show that his denials or defenses are sufficient to defeat plaintiff, and plaintiff by affidavit fails to establish triable issues of fact, the complaint may be dismissed and judgment entered for defendant.[9] However, the

Superfluous matter

Fact that statement of claim does not state facts in concise and summary form, and contains superfluous matter, does not warrant entering summary judgment for defendant.—Davis v. Investment Land Co., 146 A. 119, 296 Pa. 449.

Denial of motion to dismiss

Affirmance of an order denying motion to dismiss cause of action for insufficiency did not entitle plaintiff to summary judgment, since such order merely determined that the cause of action was sufficient from standpoint of pleading to state a good prima facie case.—Brandt v. Davidson, 48 N.Y.S.2d 917.

Which of two causes of action plaintiff intended to state is immaterial on motion for summary judgment, if allegations of complaint show any cause of action.—Sullivan v. State, 251 N.W. 251, 213 Wis. 185, 91 A.L.R. 877.

Request for amendment

If either party on hearing of motion for summary judgment finds that his pleading is inadequate, either by way of allegation or denial, court may and should permit party to amend, but in absence of request for amendment, there is no occasion to inquire about possible issues not raised by pleadings.—Gardenswartz v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of U. S., 68 P.2d 322, 23 Cal.App.2d Supp. 745.

Direction of verdict

When it appears from thorough consideration of uncontroverted facts that they would impel direction of verdict by court, no issue exists and summary judgment is properly entered.—Marco v. Whiting, supra.

Inadmissible parol testimony

In action for breach of an alleged contract to convey property, where proof of existence of such contract would have depended on inadmissible parol testimony, summary judgment for defendants was proper.—Ajax Holding Co. v. Heinsbergen, 149 P.2d 189, 64 Cal.App.2d 665.

Retention as nominal party

Where, in stockholders' action to obtain relief against both the directors and the corporation itself, stockholders were not entitled to relief against the corporation or certain defendants who moved for summary judgment dismissing complaint, but the action continued as to the nonmoving defendants, stockholders were entitled to have the corporation retained as a nominal party defendant, in so far as relief was sought against nonmoving individual defendants in favor of the corporation.—Lyon v. Question for determination

In determining whether summary judgment should be entered for defendant, question is whether statement of claim shows that law will not permit recovery by plaintiff.—Davis v. Investment Land Co., 146 A. 119, 296 Pa. 449.

Technical defects in pleading are not available to defendant on a motion to dismiss a complaint under the rule relating to summary judgment.—Benjamin v. Arundel Corp., 59 N.Y.S.2d 487, 270 App.Div. 766.

Moot action

Fact that an action has become moot is not a defense, and dismissal on that ground does not entitle defendant to summary judgment.—Duel v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Co., 9 N.W.2d 593, 243 Wis. 172.

claim if no triable issue is raised in response to his affidavits,[15] but his motion will be denied if such an issue appears.[16]

Facts established by documentary evidence or official record. Under some statutes or court rules, where an answer states a defense sufficient as a matter of law and if founded on facts established prima facie by documentary evidence or official record, defendant may obtain judgment dismissing the complaint unless plaintiff shows facts sufficient to raise an issue respecting the verity and conclusiveness of such evidence or record;[17] "defense" is used in such provisions in its broadest sense and includes everything which would defeat plaintiff's claim, including a general denial.[18] However, the complaint will not be dismissed if the defense is insufficient in law,[19] or if facts are shown sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the verity and conclusiveness of the documentary evidence.[20]

(3) Particular Causes and Issues

Summary judgment has been granted or has been denied in numerous particular actions, and with respect to numerous particular issues, depending on whether triable issues of fact were raised in opposition to the affidavits of the moving party.

The rule that summary judgment will be granted only where the moving party substantiates his claim or defense by affidavit and no triable issue of fact is raised in response thereto, discussed supra subdivisions c (1) and c (2) of this section, has been applied in numerous cases which have adjudicated the existence or nonexistence of triable issues in causes of action on express or implied contracts generally,[21] to recover the price of goods or mer-

Remedy as available in actions other than those in which plaintiff may move for judgment see supra subdivision a of this section.

Statute of frauds

Where agreement on which action was brought was unenforceable under statute of frauds, plaintiff could not defeat defendant's motion for summary judgment because plaintiff might have had a cause of action different from one set forth in complaint.—Elsfelder v. Cournand, 59 N.Y.S.2d 34, 270 App.Div. 162, followed in 59 N.Y.S.2d 377, 269 App.Div. 1034.

Books of corporate defendant are "documentary evidence" within meaning of text rule.—White v. Merchants Despatch Transp. Co., 10 N.Y.S.2d 962, 256 App.Div. 1044.

Admissions as documentary proof

In action for carrier's failure to deliver merchandise, plaintiff's admissions or concessions that there was no conversion were to be given weight of documentary proof on which defendants might move for a summary judgment.—Winkler v. Compania Sud Americana De Vapores, 41 N.Y.S.2d 67, 180 Misc. 181.

Value of services

The value of professional services rendered and the amount thereof remaining unpaid should be determined by assessment before a jury, and the granting of a summary judgment for a certain amount was improper, where allegation in complaint that services were reasonably worth the sum of one hundred dollars was denied in defendant's answer and denial found support in the affidavits.—Averbach v. Judgment for defendant denied

Wis.—Schultz v. Rayome, 19 N.W. 2d 280, 247 Wis. 178.

Defense sufficient in law

To justify denial of plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment in action on note, it is not enough that there be a factual dispute, but it must appear that the maker has a defense which is sufficient in point of law.—President and Directors of Manhattan Co. v. Cocheo, 10 N.Y.S.2d 770, 256 App.Div. 560.

Acquisition from holder in due course

Whether plaintiff acquired note from holder in due course was question of fact and hence motion for a summary judgment was properly denied.—Zabelle v. Gladstone, 8 N.Y.S. 2d 233, 255 App.Div. 953—Korn v. Garfinkel, 9 N.Y.S.2d 20.

"Summary judgment is rarely granted in actions on policies of insurance. Almost always in such cases the facts are not within the knowledge of the defendant, who is therefore entitled to have the plaintiff's claim submitted to the test of cross-examination. The better practice, even in such cases, is for the defendant to submit in proper form what knowledge he has on the subject or to set forth his lack of knowledge. But the nature of the case may be such that the very facts set forth in the moving affidavit itself demonstrate that a trial rather than a summary judgment is appropriate."—Suslensky v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 43 N.Y.S.2d 144, 146, 180 Misc. 624, affirmed 46 N.Y.S.2d 888, 267 App.Div. 812, appeal denied 60 N.Y.S.2d 294, 270 App.Div. 819.

Issue as to foreign law. A question raised as to foreign law ordinarily presents a triable issue so as to preclude the granting of summary judgment,[43] but that is not the case where no interpretive decisions of foreign courts are referred to by either side, and statutes alone are presented for construction.[44]

Damages. Where the statute or court rule permits recovery of summary judgment on an unliquidated claim where no triable issue exists, and provides for an assessment of damages to determine the amount of the judgment, an issue of fact with respect to damages will not bar judgment.[45]

Claims against decedents' estates. In actions prosecuting claims against a decedent's estate based on a transaction with the decedent, plaintiff's motion for summary judgment ordinarily will be denied notwithstanding insufficiency of opposing affidavits since the facts on which the claim is based usually are within plaintiff's exclusive knowledge and the claim should be properly proved on a trial.[46]

§ 221. Against Whom Judgment May Be Rendered

In a proper case summary judgment may be rendered against all persons permitted by statute to be joined in the action and who are parties thereto.

In a proceeding for summary judgment by motion, plaintiff may proceed against all persons permitted by statute to be joined in the action.[47] However, a summary judgment may be entered only against a party to the action,[48] and not against a third person who is not such a party.[49] Where the action is against two or more defendants, it has been held that a summary judgment may not be entered against one of them alone,[50] unless it appears that he has no defense to the action and that the others have good defenses and should be permitted to defend.[51] A motion and judgment against heirs only, where they are liable only jointly with the personal representative, has been held to be erroneous but not void, where the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter.[52] Where the motion is under a special statute which is applicable only to certain persons, judgment may be had against those only against whom the remedy is given.[53]

§ 222. Procedure in General

The procedure prescribed by statute or court rule for obtaining summary judgment on motion or in special proceedings generally must be followed, and a failure to comply therewith will preclude the granting of the motion.

A party moving for summary judgment must generally comply with the statute or court rule relating thereto, and a failure to follow the procedure prescribed will preclude the granting of a motion for summary judgment or the substantiation of a claim of defense.[54] Under statutes providing for summary judgment on motion in actions instituted in the ordinary way where no triable issue of fact is disclosed in answer to affidavits of the moving party, such a motion is the procedural equivalent of a trial,[55] and all necessary parties must be before the court, or their status must be submitted by proper proof.[56] The motion searches the record,[57] and, where made by plaintiff, it admits every material averment in the answer or affidavit of defense[58] and reopens the question of the sufficiency of the complaint;[59] but defendant's motion for judgment

Verification and statement of amount
To entitle plaintiff to a summary judgment, under Rules of Civil Practice, rule 113, the cause of action must be verified by plaintiff, or by a person having knowledge of the facts, and the amount claimed must be stated.—State Bank v. Mackstein, 205 N.Y.S. 290, 123 Misc. 416.

Unprecedented motion
Fact that defendant's motion to require plaintiff to accept as a sufficient response to plaintiff's motion to strike out the answer and for summary judgment an annexed affidavit and on the strength of such affidavit to have motion for judgment denied was unprecedented was no reason of itself for denying the motion.—Stone v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 31 N.Y.S.2d 615, 178 Misc. 23.

Admission of defense
The rule that a defense in defendant's answer stands admitted where plaintiff does not file a reply applies as well on a motion for summary judgment as on a trial.—Gliwa v. Washington Polish Loan & Building Ass'n, 34 N.E.2d 736, 310 Ill.App. 465.

Partners
In action against two partners, where only one of them files answer and papers submitted on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment do not show whether codefendant was served with process and appeared or answered motion will be held in abeyance and plaintiff will be permitted to submit proof by affidavit as to whether such codefendant was served with process, appeared and answered, and also whether he is entitled to benefits of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act.—Grossman Steel Stair Corp. v. Steinberg, supra.

Affidavits
Search of record on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment should include affidavits supporting complaint, which should be dismissed, where such affidavits disclose no cause of action, although demurrer would otherwise have to be overruled.—Sullivan v. State, 251 N.W. 251, 213 Wis. 185, 91 A.L.R. 877.

Typographical error
On motion for summary judgment, a typographical error in complaint may be corrected, and complaint will be deemed corrected for purpose of motion.—Schroeder v. Columbia Casualty Co., 213 N.Y.S. 649, 126 Misc. 205.

Unlike judgment on pleadings
While a motion for summary judgment, when properly supported by required affidavits, searches the record and permits the court to examine the complaint to determine whether it states a cause of action, such motion is not the same as a motion for judgment on the pleadings.—Fuller v. General Accident Fire & Life Assur. Corporation, Limited, of Perth, Scotland, 272 N.W. 839, 224 Wis. 603.

dismissing the complaint on the ground that there was an existing final judgment determining the same cause of action does not challenge the sufficiency of the facts alleged in the complaint to constitute a cause of action or the truth of such allegations.[60]

The filing of a motion for summary judgment does not constitute the filing of a motion for default which would preclude defendant from filing answer thereafter,[61] but a cross motion to amend the answer will not lie on a motion for summary judgment.[62] The refusal to permit interrogatories to obtain certain evidence in defense of a motion for summary judgment is not error where such evidence would not constitute a defense to the action.[63] Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment is not an acceptance of defendant's tender of part of the amount claimed but is subject to the implied reservation of the right to proceed with the prosecution of the cause of action for the remainder of his claim.[64]

Proceedings by notice of motion. Under some statutes, in lieu of an ordinary action at law, one may proceed in certain cases by way of notice of motion for judgment,[65] and under such procedure the notice constitutes the writ and declaration in the case informing defendant of the demand on which summary judgment will be sought on a future day, as is discussed infra § 223 b.

The proceedings for a summary judgment by motion on notice are of an informal nature,[66] not in all respects governed by the common-law rules of practice and procedure,[67] and are to be construed with liberality.[68] Formal pleadings usually are not required;[69] but there must be both allegation and proof to entitle plaintiff to judgment,[70] and the allegation must precede the proof,[71] and what is lacking in the allegations cannot be supplied by evidence.[72] An answer or other pleading to the motion is not required,[73] except in cases where pleadings are required by statute.[74] Defendant may either demur to the sufficiency of the notice,[75] in which case the demurrer admits the truth of all the facts properly pleaded in the notice,[76] or he

Common counts

The bare allegation of the common counts in assumpsit in a notice of motion for judgment was not sufficient to warrant recovery on the basis of fraud, since fraud must be clearly alleged and proved.—Inter-Ocean Casualty Co. v. Note not due Demurrer rather than a motion to strike is proper to attack sufficiency of motion.—Harris v. Barber, 186 So. 160, 237 Ala. 138.

Motion to quash notice of motion is equivalent of demurrer with respect to attacking defects in notice.—Kitson v. Messenger, 27 S.E.2d 265, 126 W.Va. 60.

Matters considered

may tender an issue by plea;[77] or, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, he may file an informal statement in writing of his grounds of defense.[78] Where the grounds of defense are set up in writing without a formal pleading, the parties are generally deemed to be at issue on the grounds so stated without the necessity for a replication or other pleading.[79]

Under the doctrine that defendant may plead as many several matters of law or fact as he thinks necessary and is not required to file all his pleas in bar at the same time, the filing of a special plea is not a waiver of other grounds of defense.[80] Where defendant has appeared, he cannot demur to the notice on the ground that it does not appear therefrom at what time the court is to be held, but his objection, if available, must be taken by plea in abatement.[81] There is, strictly speaking, no such pleading as a general issue to a notice,[82] but the court may accept it as a general denial of plaintiff's claim set up in the notice, and, like other general issues, it may be pleaded orally.[83]

Supreme court commissioners. Under some statutes supreme court commissioners designated to hear and determine motions preliminary to trial have no power to make an order for summary judgment.[84]

§ 223. Notice

a. In general
b. Nature and sufficiency of notice as a pleading

a. In General

A party against whom summary judgment is sought must be served with timely, proper, and sufficient notice of the motion, and there must be a compliance with statutory requirements as to the service, return, and docketing of the notice.

As a general rule, it is essential to the validity of a judgment on motion that defendant be served with proper and sufficient notice of the motion, as required by the statute or court rule,[85] within the time specified therein,[86] and, even where the statute authorizing such a proceeding is silent as to notice, defendant is entitled to a reasonable notice;[87] but the requirement of notice may be waived by the party against whom judgment or order is sought.[88] The giving of notice will not be inferred from a

Notice held sufficient

Notice of motion, requesting judgment on pleadings, and for such other relief as court may deem just, brought plaintiff within statute providing for partial summary judgment on motion.—Little Falls Dairy Co., v. Berghorn, 224 N.Y.S. 34, 130 Misc. 454.

Who issues notice

Notice in motion proceedings for judgment emanates from plaintiff and does not come within control of court until return to clerk of court. —Pereira v. Davis Financial Agency, 135 S.E. 823, 146 Va. 215.

86. N.Y.—Wise v. Powell, 215 N.Y. S. 693, 216 App.Div. 618.

After time for reply

Notice of motion to strike answer and for summary judgment was not ineffective because given after expiration of time for reply.—Charles S. Schultz & Son v. Klipper, 145 A. 634, 7 N.J.Misc. 391, followed in Newell v. Klipper, 145 A. 635, 7 N. J.Misc. 398.

Defect held nonprejudicial

Motion for summary judgment would not be denied for failure to give notice within prescribed time where motion was argued on merits and defendants were not prejudiced, having submitted complete set of affidavits in objection to motion.—Le Fevre v. Reliable Paint Supply Co., 278 N.Y.S. 903, 152 Misc. 594.

Particular requirements

Any person entitled to recover money by action on contract may obtain judgment by motion in a court having jurisdiction, after having given his debtor notice in writing of such motion for at least twenty days of the time and court in which the motion will be made, which notice shall be returned to the clerk's office of such court at least fifteen days before the time such motion is heard.—Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Dixon, 117 S.E. 685, 94 W.Va. 21.

Tenn.—Williamson v. Burge, 7 Heisk. 117.

88. Ark.—Brickell v. Guaranty Loan & Trust Co., 93 S.W.2d 656, 192 Ark. 652.

No prejudice

The entering of plaintiff's motion for summary judgment was not error, notwithstanding notice of plaintiff's motion did not cover a motion for summary judgment, where defendants were in court in response to the notice and had been permitted to and did file an original and amended affidavit of defense, and there was no prejudice to defendants, and the trial court had before it the several sworn pleadings of the parties and the parties themselves.—Smith v. Karasek, 40 N.E.2d 594, 313 Ill.App. 654.

statement on the record that the parties came by their attorneys.[89]

As to place and time of motion. The notice must allege the place where,[90] and the time when,[91] the motion will be made. It has been held to be sufficient if it states that a judgment will be moved for at a specified term of the court;[92] and it need not designate the day on which the motion will be made[93] unless the statute requires that it must summon the party on whom it is served to a fixed and certain day.[94] The notice need not be dated,[95] unless the date is made material by a reference to it as indicating the time when the motion will be made, or unless it is material for the purpose of showing the time when the court is to be held, such time not otherwise appearing.[96]

Service, return, and docketing. There must be a compliance with statutory requirements as to the service,[97] return,[98] and docketing[99] of the notice. It must be served on defendant the prescribed period before the day on which the motion is to be made,[1] although an error in this respect may be waived by defendant's appearing and consenting to the trial without objection.[2] If the notice is served prematurely, it is subject to a plea in abatement.[3]

b. Nature and Sufficiency of Notice as a Pleading

In special proceedings for judgment instituted by notice of motion, the notice serves the purpose of a writ and declaration and must state with reasonable certainty sufficient facts to show a good cause of action against the defendant, and if the notice is uncertain the plaintiff may be required to file a bill of particulars.

The statutes of some states, as discussed supra § 222, authorize special proceedings for judgment instituted by notice of the proposed motion. In such proceedings, notice of the motion serves the purpose both of a writ and a declaration.[4] It therefore must allege facts which are necessary to show jurisdiction;[5] and, although it need not set out, in

Service by marshal

On notice of motion for judgment, under practice in some jurisdictions, it is not necessary that writ or other process be served by marshal to bring defendants into court.—Chisholm v. Gilmer, C.C.A.Va., 81 F.2d 120, affirmed 57 S.Ct. 65, 299 U.S. 99, 81 L.Ed. 63, rehearing denied 57 S. Ct. 229, 299 U.S. 623, 81 L.Ed. 458.

Notice returnable after adjournment

Cause based on contract

Recovery on notice of motion for judgment is confined to recovery based on contract, and it is necessary that essential elements showing money due on contract as distinguished from damages for breach be alleged notwithstanding no formality of pleading is exacted.—City of Beckley v. Craighead, 24 S.E.2d 908, 125 W.Va. 484.

hæc verba, the contract or instrument relied on,[6] it must state with reasonable certainty[7] sufficient facts to show a good cause of action against defendant,[8] and fairly apprise him of the nature of the demand made on him,[9] and to enable the court to say that, if the facts stated are proved, plaintiff is entitled to recover;[10] and it must indicate with reasonable certainty that the obligation which it is proposed to reduce to judgment is that of defendant.[11] It is not necessary to have separate counts in the notice,[12] and the case may be stated in a composite form;[13] and, while the notice is insufficient if it states too little,[14] any excess therein may as a general rule be treated as surplusage.[15]

Bill of particulars. Under some statutes, if the notice is uncertain as to the facts constituting the cause of action, the court, on demand of defendant, should require plaintiff to file a bill of particulars.[16] If the bill of particulars is insufficient, defendant may move to reject any evidence offered by plaintiff touching any matters not described in the notice or other pleading so plainly as to give notice of its character.[17] Bills of particulars filed by plaintiff following his original notices are no part of the original or amended notices and are not to be considered in determining their sufficiency.[18]

Amendment. The court may permit the notice to be amended during the proceedings, where defendant is not thereby taken by surprise.[19]

(4) Where notice of motion for judgment is accompanied by statement of account made part thereof, items designated "To Mdse." are sufficient, without naming each particular article making up items listed.—George A. Kelley Co. v. Phillips, 134 S.E. 469, 102 W.Va. 85.

§ 224. Motion

A motion for summary judgment must be made by proper application to the court and should be proceeded with within the proper time.

Under the practice prevailing in some states, a motion for summary judgment generally must be made by application to the court for such relief,[20] but formal requirements have been dispensed with in some cases,[21] and motions not expressly seeking summary judgment or referring to the court rule providing therefor have sometimes been treated as motions for summary judgment where it otherwise appeared that such was the intent of the moving party.[22] Under some statutes or court rules, on a motion for summary judgment by one party, the court may award judgment to the other party if he is entitled thereto notwithstanding such other party has not made a cross motion therefor.[23] A motion to strike the motion for summary judgment has been held proper procedure to test its sufficiency.[24]

As a general rule, a motion for judgment must be made and proceeded with within the proper time,[25] and under some statutes or court rules such a motion may be entertained only after answer is filed[26] and issue is joined,[27] although it may be pursued at any subsequent stage of the litigation.[28] In proceedings instituted by notice of motion for judgment, if the motion is not proceeded with at the term to which the notice is returnable,[29] or on the day specified in the notice,[30] it operates as a discontinuance, and the case cannot be taken up subsequently, and judgment entered, on the same motion, unless defendant waives the objection by appearing personally and failing to object at the proper time,[31] or by himself calling up the motion.[32] However, discontinuance of the proceeding by reason of fail-

A motion to dismiss case as moot could not be treated as a motion for summary judgment as the latter involves a determination of existence of a cause of action and virtue of claimed defenses, and practice of dismissing actions when questions have become moot does not arise out of statute relating to summary judgment.—Duel v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 9 N.W.2d 593, 243 Wis. 172.

Use of affidavits is not permitted under rules providing for judgment on the pleadings, for striking out of a pleading as sham, or for dismissal of counterclaim or striking out of defense consisting of new matter in certain cases and a motion based thereon and on other rules concerning summary judgments permitting affidavits will be treated as motion under such other rules.—Henderson v. Hildreth Varnish Co., 276 N.Y.S. 414.

Motion for judgment on pleadings
(1) Motion ostensibly for judgment on pleadings would be treated as motion for summary judgment where letter was annexed to motion papers and additional agreed facts were stated in argument.—Mara v. U. S., D.C.N.Y., 54 F.2d 397.

(2) Fact that affidavits were used on motion for judgment was held to show that it was for summary judgment, and not for judgment on pleadings.—Donelly v. Bauder, 216 N.Y.S. 437, 217 App.Div. 59.

§ 225. Affidavits and Other Evidence

a. In general
b. In support of motion
c. In opposition to motion
d. Applications of rules

a. In General

The function of affidavits on a motion for summary judgment is to show whether the issues are genuine and require a trial. They should contain evidentiary facts, not conclusions or mere general averments; and they must be made by affiants having personal knowledge of the facts and competent to testify thereto.

The affidavits on a motion for summary judgment do not constitute a second set of pleadings in the action,[34] the purpose of the affidavits being only to show whether or not the issues apparently made by the formal pleadings are genuine and require a trial, and whether or not each party has competent evidence to offer which tends to support his side of the issue.[35] Summary judgment statutes are not intended to authorize the trial of contested issues on affidavits,[36] and hence summary judgment cannot be granted, on motion of either plaintiff or defendant, where the affidavits or other proofs submitted set forth facts showing that there is a triable issue of fact.[37] Where court rules relating to the affidavits in support of, or in opposition to, a motion

Analogy to questions for jury

(1) A summary judgment may not be entered where, if evidence contained in affidavits was orally submitted to the court, there would be something left to go to the jury; but summary judgment should be entered if what is contained in the affidavits would have constituted all evidence before the court, and, on such evidence, there would be nothing left to go to the jury.—Shirley v. Ellis Drier Co., 39 N.E.2d 329, 379 Ill. 105.

(2) "If the pleadings taking them as they stand make a case for trial by a jury, a summary judgment will be denied unless it appears from the affidavits that different conclusions of essential ultimate fact can not reasonably be drawn."—Hanson v. Halvorson, 19 N.W.2d 882, 883, 247 Wis. 434.

Possibility of amending pleadings

Facts in affidavits and record control and if pleadings can be amended to include such facts or defenses they must be considered.—Benjamin v. Arundel Corp., 59 N.Y.S.2d 437.

On issues of good faith, intent, and purpose, the bald declaration of a party by affidavit is insufficient in the face of a pleaded denial to resolve the issue.—Hatfield v. Barnes, Colo., 168 P.2d 552.

Statement in affidavit of attorney that hospital was not a charitable institution was a conclusion of law, and was insufficient under statute requiring statement of evidentiary facts.—Schau v. Morgan, 6 N.W.2d 212, 241 Wis. 334.

Indebtedness

In action on common counts for amount owing plaintiff by defendant, statement in affidavit supporting plaintiff's motion for summary judgment that indebtedness was on account of purchase of merchandise and products mentioned in affidavit and agreements attached as exhibits was statement of fact, not conclusion.—Terre Haute Brewing Co. v. Admission of elements of cause of action

Motion for summary judgment would be granted where defendant admitted all elements of plaintiff's cause of action, notwithstanding moving affidavit was made by attorney and not by plaintiff or some person having knowledge of facts.—Johnson v. Briggs, Inc., 12 N.Y.S.2d 60.

Affidavit of felon

In a jurisdiction in which a felon is a competent witness on a trial, a motion for summary judgment may be predicated on the affidavit of a felon, and the test to be applied to such affidavit is the test to be applied to the affidavit of any witness.—William J. Conners Car Co. v. Manufacturers' & Traders' Nat. Bank of Buffalo, 209 N.Y.S. 406, 124 Misc. 584, affirmed 210 N.Y.S. 939, 214 App. Div. 811.

forth evidentiary[43] and not ultimate[44] facts, and should set forth the facts with particularity,[45] mere general averments being insufficient.[46] However, the affidavit need not be composed wholly of strictly evidentiary facts,[47] and an affiant is not required to aver as a fact that which is not a fact, but an opinion.[48]

Burden of proof. Provisions authorizing summary judgment do not shift the burden of proof.[49] Where the motion for summary judgment is made by plaintiff, he is required to sustain the burden of submitting convincing proof, by affidavit or otherwise, that the answer is sham, and that there is no real defense or real issue to be determined.[50] On a motion by defendant for summary judgment the burden is on defendant to establish his defense by proof of the facts pleaded.[51]

Documentary evidence; attachment of papers. Under some court rules, where a sufficient defense is founded on facts established prima facie by documentary or official record, defendant may have summary judgment in his favor unless plaintiff shows facts sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the verity and conclusiveness of such documentary evidence or official record;[52] and the defense

Violation of parol evidence rule

(1) Defendant's affidavit raising defense obnoxious to parol evidence rule was insufficient.—Power v. Allied Asphalt Products Corporation, 159 A. 251, 162 Md. 175.

(2) An affidavit stating the contents of certain writings by giving their purport but not their words is not sufficient, since as a witness the affiant could not competently give such testimony, over proper objection, there being no showing of loss of the writings or other circumstances which would excuse production of the originals.—Gardenswartz v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of the U. S., 68 P.2d 322, 23 Cal.App.2d Supp. 745.

(3) Introduction contained in affidavits in support of motion for summary judgment, which stated facts leading up to preparation of original order, did not render affidavits inadmissible as an attempt to vary terms of written contract between parties, but introduction could be treated as mere surplusage.—Lowenstern Bros. v. When documentary evidence required Under some rules, where case is one of those enumerated in specified subdivisions, affidavits may be used on motion for summary judgment, but otherwise the defense must be established by documentary evidence.—Dumont v. Raymond, 49 N.Y.

relied on need not be an affirmative defense.[53] Under some rules of this nature there is nothing which specifies or limits the form or character of the documentary evidence or official record on which the motion for summary judgment by a defendant is to be based;[54] the documentary proof required under these provisions is not limited to that which prima facie, completely, and conclusively establishes the defense, without resort to extrinsic or fragmentary connecting links of proof supplied by affidavit or scattered entries or memoranda.[55] Defendant need not present all the official record, and if he submits merely part of the record it is within the province of plaintiff to submit the remainder if in his judgment he can thereby show facts sufficient to raise an issue as to the official record.[56] Under provisions of this nature the defense must be established prima facie by documentary evidence or official record,[57] and summary judgment will be denied where plaintiff's showing of the facts is sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the verity and conclusiveness of the documentary evidence or official records adduced by defendant.[58]

Some court rules require the attachment of copies of all papers on which a party relies on a motion for summary judgment,[59] but the failure to attach all such papers has been held not to be fatal to a granting of the motion where copies of the exhibits were either attached to the complaint, or were contained in the files in the clerk's office, or were available to defendant at any time.[60]

What constitutes documentary evidence or official records

(1) In stockholders' derivative action against corporate officers and directors invoices and petty cash slips, and excerpts from, and photostatic copies of, corporate books and records constituted "documentary evidence" which could be considered on defendants' motion for summary judgment.—Dumont v. Raymond, 49 N.Y.S.2d 865, affirmed 56 N.Y.S.2d 592, 269 App.Div. 592.

(2) In such an action, however, affidavits vouching for purity of defendants' motives and seeking to justify acts criticized by plaintiffs, do not constitute "documentary evidence" within the rule.—Dumont v. Raymond, supra.

(3) In action for injuries sustained as result of defendant's alleged negligent construction of machine, affidavits of defendant's vice president and of defendant's buyer and copy of purchasing agreement indicating that machine was purchased from a third person and not manufactured by defendant were not "documentary evidence" or "official records" as contemplated by rule.—Dewar v. Sears Roebuck & Co., 49 N.Y.S.2d 404.

Competency or admissibility

Where affidavits and certificates were supplied to plaintiff by defendant at plaintiff's request, plaintiff could not object to them on ground of competency or admissibility.—Diamond v. Davis, 38 N.Y.S.2d 93, affirmed 39 N.Y.S.2d 412, second case, 265 App.Div. 919, appeal denied 41 N.Y.S.2d 191, second case, 265 App.Div. 1052, and affirmed 54 N.E.2d 683, second case, 292 N.Y. 554.

Original or copy

Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of U. S., 68 P.2d 322, 23 Cal.App.2d Supp. 745.

Settlement agreement

If settlement agreement, alleged as defense to action on note, was in writing, such writing should have been produced in evidence to defeat motion for summary judgment.—Di Roma v. Chambers Drug Store, 28 N.Y.S.2d 170, 262 App.Div. 856.

Vouchers

In action under Speedy Judgment Act, it is necessary that plaintiff file any vouchers of his claim at time he institutes his suit, and vouchers must show on their face a prima facie case of defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff for certain amount or an amount which they furnish the means of making certain.—Katski v. Triplett, 30 A.2d 764, 181 Md. 545.

discretion, require production of witnesses for oral examination in open court.[61]

b. In Support of Motion

In order to justify the granting of a motion for summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the affidavits or other proof adduced in support of the motion must verify the cause of action and negative the existence of a defense, or, where the motion is made by the defendant, must establish the sufficiency of his defense. They must, in addition, contain any formal statements required by statute, such as a statement of an affiant's belief that there is no defense to the action, or, where the motion is by the defendant, that there is no merit to the action.

The affidavits of the moving party must contain facts sufficient to entitle him to judgment in his favor,[62] and are to be strictly construed.[63] They must comply with the statutory requirements and the rules of court[64] as to the matters required to be stated[65] and as to service on the adverse party.[66]

Ordinarily, in order that plaintiff may be entitled to summary judgment on motion, he must file, in support thereof, an affidavit or other proof which fully and clearly verifies or states the facts which constitute his cause of action against defendant, and negatives the existence of a defense;[67] and, if plaintiff's affidavits are insufficient to support his cause of action, the motion should be denied.[68] It

Method of testing sufficiency

Under some statutes a motion to strike an affidavit for summary judgment from the files is a proper method of testing the sufficiency of the affidavit.—People, for Use of Dyer, v. Sawyer, 2 N.E.2d 343, 284 Ill.App. 463.

Knowledge of affiant

Plaintiff's affidavit that he could swear to the facts of his own knowledge, but without doing so, is insufficient to support his motion for summary judgment.—Minuto v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 179 A. 713, 55 R.I. 201.

Statement as constituting "account"

Where plaintiffs intending to bring suit under the Speedy Judgment Act filed with their declaration a statement under affidavit claiming that defendants were indebted to them in a specified sum, but statement did not mention any items of merchandise alleged to have been sold to the defendants, or a copy of agreements subsequently relied on wherein defendants promised to be liable for merchandise purchased, the statement did not constitute an "account" within meaning of the statute.—Katski v. Execution of contract Plaintiff seeking summary judgment for amounts due under assigned land contract must first prove that such contract was entered into by defendants.—MacClure v. Noble, 244 N.W. 174, 259 Mich. 601.

Effect of tender

Plaintiff's application for partial judgment must be supported by proof that part of plaintiff's claim is admitted, and defendant's tender and payment into court of part of amount claimed does not itself furnish such proof.—Fleder v. Itkin, 60 N.E.2d 753, 294 N.Y. 77.

Computation of amount claimed

Where declaration is based on common counts, plaintiff's affidavit, alleging defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff in certain amount, need not state manner in which such amount was computed.—Terre Haute Brewing Co. v. Goldberg, 289 N.W. 192, 291 Mich. 401.

Bad count

Under statutes whereby the description of plaintiff's cause of action in his affidavit becomes a part of each count in his declaration, the fact that one of the counts is bad in law does not vitiate the statement of the cause of action contained in the affidavit which is documented, clear, distinct, and precise; and a defendant who has failed to demur or object to a count cannot reach the defect through an objection to the affidavit.—Power v. Allied As-has been held, however, that summary judgment will not be denied because of the insufficiency of plaintiff's affidavit where the complaint is sufficient and its essential facts are admitted.[69] Plaintiff's affidavits must do more than merely set forth those allegations which would be required by a pleading to constitute a cause of action;[70] they should set forth the evidentiary facts, from the existence of which the conclusion of law must follow that plaintiff's claim is valid and enforceable.[71] Although plaintiff cannot convert his affidavit into a pleading,[72] and, by anticipating therein a defense, require defendant to negative or defend against such new matter,[73] it has been held that if his complaint is merely defective it may be deemed amended for the purpose of the motion where the affidavits filed in support of the motion contain facts which cure the defects.[74]

On a motion by defendant for summary judgment dismissing the complaint, his affidavits must set forth evidentiary facts showing the sufficiency of his defense.[75] He must make out a clear case on undisputed material facts presented on the record.[76] However, where the affidavits or other proofs do establish that the action has no merit and that there is no triable issue, a motion by defendant for summary judgment in his favor is properly granted.[77]

Belief as to merit of action or defense. It is frequently required by the statutes or rules of court that, on a motion by plaintiff for summary judgment, the affidavits submitted in support of the motion state the belief of one having knowledge of the facts that there is no defense to the action.[78] The fact, however, that none of the affidavits presented by plaintiff contains the averment that there is no defense to the action is not fatal to the legal efficacy of the affidavits, where affiants have used language which is equivalent in sense and meaning to the words employed by the statute.[79]

Affidavits of a defendant submitted in support of a motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint are required by some provisions to state his belief that the action has no merit.[80]

Verification of cause of action

Foundation of proceeding

Plaintiff's affidavit in aid of motion for summary judgment is the foundation and not a mere incident of such proceedings, and facts within personal knowledge of affiant must be set out sufficiently to apprise the court with reasonable certainty of the truth of plaintiff's claim.—Minuto v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 179 A. 713, 55 R.I. 201.

Originals or copies of instruments involved

(2) Insured's affidavit in support of motion for summary judgment in action on disability policies, which affidavit stated provisions of policies by their legal effect only without any showing to excuse production of originals, was insufficient, if any showing of provisions of policies was required; but in the particular case insured's affidavit was held not insufficient where affidavits set forth provisions of policies by their legal effect and insurer's answer set forth exact language of policies and denied execution thereof in any other terms, and there was no issue in pleading as to issuance of policies or their terms.—Gardenswartz v. By whom made. Plaintiff's affidavit may be made either by plaintiff himself[81] or by his agent;[82] and if it is made by an agent it is not necessary that it should show why plaintiff did not execute it[83] nor need it expressly appear whether the agent's knowledge is personal or is merely based on information and belief.[84]

Amendment of affidavit. Whether or not plaintiff should be permitted to amend his affidavit of merit is a matter within the sound discretion of the court.[85]

Special proceedings for judgment by notice of motion. Under statutes providing for special proceedings for judgment by notice of motion, discussed generally supra § 222, an affidavit may be used to supplement the notice of motion.[86] Such affidavit should refer to the notice and the demand or demands therein stated,[87] and must comply with statutory requirements as to the time of making[88] and as to its service on defendant.[89] The use of exhibits in a notice of motion for judgment proceeding has been held improper.[90]

c. In Opposition to Motion

After the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case for summary judgment by his proofs, the defendant by affidavits or other proof must show a bona fide defense, although in this he is aided by a liberal construction of his affidavits, and the acceptance as true of the statements therein.

Defendant is entitled to an opportunity to interpose an affidavit in response to plaintiff's proof, and to have the affidavit weighed as against such proof.[91] Indeed, where plaintiff has shown sufficient facts to make out his case, if defendant contests the granting of the motion and wishes to be entitled to defend, he must establish by affidavit or other proof such facts as show that he has a bona fide defense to the action,[92] and the mere filing of an answer containing denials or raising an issue of fact is not sufficient.[93] Where defendant does not deny the allegations of the affidavit presented by

Basis of belief
A provision in summary judgment statute requiring party moving for summary judgment to make a verified statement that he believes that the action has no merit does not require the moving party to state the basis for his belief, or that he had been so advised by an attorney, and does not require an affidavit by an attorney to that effect.—Tregloan v. Cause of action
Under some statutes, the affidavit filed with a notice of motion for judgment need not set out a cause of action stated in the notice, but is sufficient if it states that there is, as affiant verily believes, due and unpaid, from defendant to plaintiff, on demand or demands stated in the notice, including principal and interest, after deducting all payments, credits, and set-offs made by defendant, or of which, he is entitled, a sum certain, named.—Citizens' Nat. plaintiff in support of his motion, the allegations of that affidavit are taken as true.[94]

Defendant, however, is under no duty to challenge the claim of plaintiff or to submit affidavits or proof showing a meritorious defense, unless the affidavits or other proof in support of the motion show in the first instance a good cause of action in plaintiff and that the defense is without merit.[95] If plaintiff's complaint[96] or affidavits or proof[97] are insufficient to justify summary judgment the motion must be denied although defendant fails to file an opposing affidavit or to show any facts sufficient to entitle him to defend. Defendant is under no burden to show that affirmative allegations in the defense are not sham when the attack on such allegations is made solely on the ground that they are insufficient in law.[98]

Where the motion for summary judgment is made by defendant, the allegations of the complaint do not constitute proof on behalf of plaintiff of the facts therein alleged so as to defeat the motion.[99]

The general requirements of an affidavit filed in opposition to a motion for summary judgment are no different from those necessary in support of a summary judgment.[1] The averment of facts which create only an issue of law, rather than an issue of fact, will not defeat the motion.[2] To avert summary judgment in favor of plaintiff, the affidavits or other proof adduced by defendant must disclose a good defense or set out facts and circumstances sufficient to raise a triable issue of fact and to entitle defendant to defend.[3] Affidavits of defendant opposing a motion for summary judgment which Insufficiencies in affidavit of merits, filed by defendants in proceeding for summary judgment, are unimportant, where plaintiff's own showing discloses fact issues.—Caswell v. Stearns, 241 N.W. 165, 257 Mich. 461.

Duty to deny statement of ultimate fact

Defendant need not submit an opposing affidavit to an allegation which is at best a statement of an ultimate fact, rather than a statement of evidentiary facts which proves plaintiff's cause of action.—Kellog v. Berkshire Bldg. Corporation, 211 N.Y.S. 623, 125 Misc. 818.

Denial of infancy

In an action by an infant to disaffirm a contract, defendant's denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to plaintiff's infancy is insufficient to defeat plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, in the absence of a showing contrary to the proof advanced by plaintiff by affidavit and his birth certificate.—Bower v. M. Samuels & Co., 234 N.Y.S. 379, 226 App.Div. 769, affirmed 170 N.E. 138, 252 N.Y. 549.

Mere refusal to concede statements

A statement in an affidavit that defendant does not concede certain statements made in plaintiff's affidavit is unavailing as counter proof on a motion for a summary judgment.—Honkkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation v. Lazard-Godchaux Co. of America, 201 N.Y.S. 771, 207 App.Div. 174, appeal denied 143 N.E. 761, 237 N.Y. 604, and affirmed 147 N.E. 216, 239 N.Y. 610.

Discretion of court

Trial court was vested with sound judicial discretion to deny motion for summary judgment against defendant on ground that defendant's answers to interrogatories were modified expressions and not positive declarations.—Aycock v. Bottoms, 144 S.W.2d 43, 201 Ark. 104.

Presumption of exercise of ordinary care

granted where the affidavits submitted in opposition state facts which, if true, would constitute a defense,[11] or, as the rule is sometimes expressed, in order to warrant summary judgment against defendant, there must be a failure on the part of defendant to satisfy the court by affidavit or other proof that there is any basis for his denial or any truth in his defense.[12] The fact that the statements made in the opposing affidavit are made on information and belief does not of itself render the affidavit insufficient to defeat the motion.[13] In the exercise of its sound discretion, the court may grant defendant the right to amend an affidavit of defense which, although suggesting a triable issue, may be incomplete or technically deficient.[14]

Difficulty of making proper showing. Failure of defendant to dispute the facts presented in plaintiff's affidavit is not excused on the ground that the necessary proof would be difficult to obtain.[15] Under some circumstances, however, the court in the exercise of its discretion may deny a motion for summary judgment even though defendant is unable to make a showing such as the statute requires, as where the facts of the defense are not within defendant's knowledge and other persons who know or claim to know them refuse to make affidavits to be used in opposition to the motion;[16] but before defendant may have the benefit of this rule he should at least present an affidavit by some one who states of his own knowledge that such other persons do know or claim to know the facts and have refused to make affidavits,[17] and such affidavit ought to name the other persons and set forth what each one knows or claims to know, in a manner similar to an affidavit for continuance on the ground of absence of witnesses.[18]

Preponderance of proof unnecessary. Where the motion for summary judgment is made by plaintiff, the affidavits of defendant are not required to establish his defense by a preponderance of proof.[19] Similarly, on a motion by defendant for summary judgment, plaintiff is not required to establish his defense to the motion by a preponderance of the proof.[20]

Conclusiveness of testimony before trial

Testimony of a witness before trial is not conclusive and does not on motion for summary judgment preclude consideration of his supplemental statement contained in affidavit.—Strauss v. G. H. Mumm Champagne & Associates, 30 N.Y.S.2d 117, 262 App.Div. 971.

Incredibility

Claims of defendant's witnesses relative to issue of fact raised by answer should not be disposed of on affidavits, on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, on ground that testimony is incredible as matter of law.—Danneman v. White, 283 N.Y.S. 868, 246 App.Div. 727.

Consideration of entire affidavit

Weight and credibility of defense

Where affidavit in opposition to plaintiff's motion for summary judgment indicates that there may be a defense to the action, the weight and credibility of such defense is for the jury, and court cannot discount it entirely.—La Pointe v. Wilson, 61 N.Y.S.2d 64.

Effect of failure to deny of the facts, a denial by such representative of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief is sometimes sufficient to defeat plaintiff's motion for summary judgment where it does not appear that the representative has such factual knowledge of the circumstances as to make his denial worthless.[21] A mere statement in the representative's affidavit of want of knowledge of the facts does not, however, prevent summary judgment,[22] such a want of knowledge being sufficient to prevent summary judgment only when it appears that a thorough investigation has been made and that ignorance persists after genuine efforts to ascertain the facts.[23]

Objections to affidavits; motion to strike. The better practice is for defendant to include in his affidavit all his objections to plaintiff's affidavit.[24] It has also been held, however, that the failure of defendant to object to plaintiff's affidavit is not a waiver of errors therein, since unless plaintiff does those things which the statutes prescribe as essential to jurisdiction he can claim none of its benefits.[25]

Under the practice in some jurisdictions, a plaintiff who contends that the affidavit or affidavits submitted by defendant do not present a defense, or are otherwise objectionable, should move to strike all of the affidavit or the objectionable parts;[26] and a defendant who desires to test the sufficiency of plaintiff's motion and affidavit for summary judgment should file a written motion to strike, specifying his objections.[27] On a motion to strike an affidavit or portions thereof, the material facts well pleaded or stated in the affidavit are deemed admitted.[28]

Service of affidavits. The court may permit answering affidavits in a proper case, although they are not served within the time limited by the moving party.[29] Under the practice in some jurisdictions, a party moving for summary judgment who gives sufficient notice of his motion may require that the adverse party serve his affidavits in opposition a specified time before the hearing; and where without good cause the opposing party has failed to comply with such a demand the court may refuse to receive his affidavits.[30]

Counterclaims or set-offs. Summary judgment in favor of defendant on a counterclaim asserted by him is proper where there is no substantial evidence in the affidavits to sustain any of the defenses alleged in plaintiff's reply;[31] but the submission of affidavits by plaintiff which raise a triable issue as to the counterclaim precludes summary judgment thereon.[32]

It has been held that, under a plea of non assumpsit to a motion on an open account, defendant may prove set-offs.[33]

d. Applications of Rules

The principles governing the necessity and sufficiency of affidavits or other proofs in support of, or in opposition to, a motion for summary judgment have been applied in a great variety of cases, and summary judgments have been granted or denied, on motion of either the plaintiff or the defendant, according to the circumstances of particular cases.

In accordance with the principles discussed in the foregoing subdivisions of this section, the affidavits or other proofs submitted by plaintiff on a motion for summary judgment in his favor, coupled with the failure of defendant sufficiently to contro-

Genuineness of testator's signature

In action against executor on note wherein plaintiff filed motion for summary judgment, counter-affidavit of defendant denying signature of testator on note and demanding proof of genuineness of signature was held ineffectual as showing of facts entitling executor to defend.—Norwood Morris Plan Co. v. McCarthy, 4 N.E.2d 450, 295 Mass. 597, 107 A.L.R. 1215.

Agreement respecting payment of different note

In action on demand note, written agreement respecting payment of earlier note not held by plaintiff was held inapplicable to note in suit and could not prevent summary judgment for plaintiff, where execution and delivery of note in suit were admitted.—White v. Douglas, 270 N.Y.S. 661, 240 App.Div. 530.

In other cases the affidavits or proofs submitted by plaintiff, when considered with the opposing affidavits or proofs submitted by defendant, have been held insufficient to justify summary judgment, at least for the full amount claimed,[60] as, for example, in actions for or involving accounts,[61] assessment of stockholders,[62] bonds,[63] building or construction contracts,[64] checks,[65] commissions,[66]

Abandonment

In action for rent wherein main defense was abandonment of lease, an affidavit resisting the motion which failed to show that lessors knew of lessee's intention to abandon or the abandonment by the lessee was insufficient to resist the motion for summary judgment.—Shea v. Usury

Where right of individual obligors on bond to raise defense of usury depended on whether or not they were principals or merely sureties or guarantors of corporation's debts, and contradictory affidavits had been submitted on that issue, rendition of summary judgment against individual defendants was improper.—Pink v. Hospital as charitable institution

In action for injuries to patient at hospital, the mere assertion of patient's counsel in affidavit that defendant hospital was not a charitable institution did not create an issue as opposed to affidavit of hospital's superintendent which contained copies of material documents, the articles of incorporation, constitution, and by-laws, which showed the actual charitable, benevolent, and educational practices of defendant; and hence defendant's motion for summary judgment should have been granted.—Schau v. § 226. Hearing and Determination; Relief Awarded

A motion for summary judgment is to be determined on the facts shown by the record, and relief awarded in accordance with the rules of law and equity.

In passing on a motion for summary judgment the court should consider all the facts shown by the record,[29] and, if the circumstances require, may hold its decision on the motion in abeyance pending submission to it of facts necessary for a determination.[30] The pleadings should be considered in order that the court may know what the issues are,[31] although it has been held that, on a motion for summary judgment by plaintiff, the court will not decide whether particular defenses have been properly denominated or pleaded.[32] The questions to be decided are whether the facts set forth sufficiently show all that the case will involve on a trial, and whether the evidence, including the pleadings and exhibits, clearly demonstrates that the movants are entitled to judgment in their favor.[33]

Relief is to be awarded in accordance with the rules of law and equity,[34] and, where the circum-

Ill.—Gliwa v. Washington Polish Loan & Building Ass'n, 34 N.E.2d 736, 310 Ill.App. 465.

Matters subsequent to formation of original issues

The court has jurisdiction to render summary judgment on issues raised by stipulations and facts occurring after the formation of issues by the original pleadings, since such stipulations and facts could be set up by supplemental pleadings.—Costello v. Polenska, 7 N.W.2d 593, 242 Wis. 204, modified on other grounds 8 N.W.2d 307, 242 Wis. 204.

Correction of name

A difference in pleadings and notice of motion for summary judgment as to defendant's name will be disregarded on filing of affidavit as to his correct name.—Grossman Steel Stair Corp. v. Steinberg, 54 N.Y.S.2d 275.

Request for additional information

It was held not improper for the court, after argument on motion for summary judgment, to ask for additional information which was supplied, and which completed the showing that entitled plaintiff to summary judgment, where defendants were accorded full opportunity to supply any facts which they deemed material and motion papers contained all that was necessary to advise defendants of claim of plaintiff.—Winter v. A liberal construction must be given to the pleadings of the party against whom the motion is made.—Eagle Oil & Refining Co. v. Prentice, 122 P.2d 264, 19 Cal.2d 553.

Inclusion of separate defense in answer

Plaintiff's motion that amended answer be stricken and summary judgment entered for him constituted an attack on answer as it then stood, and propriety of granting of motion must be tested on understanding that answer included separate defense to which general demurrer was pending.—Ware v. Heller, 148 P.2d 410, 63 Cal.App.2d 817.

Cross complaint treated as counterclaim

It has been held that a cross complaint could be treated as counterclaim, notwithstanding statute relating to summary judgments does not specifically mention cross complaints.—Loehr v. Stenz, 263 N.W. 373, 219 Wis. 361.

"The test of a motion for summary judgment is whether the pleadings, affidavits, and exhibits in support of the motion are sufficient to overcome the opposing papers, and to justify a finding as a matter of law that there is no defense to the action."—Stuyvesant Credit Union v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., 267 N.Y.S. 302, 305, 239 App.Div. 187—Tidewater Oil Sales Corporation v. Pierce, 210 N.Y.S. 759, 760, 213 App.Div. 796—Wm. H. Frear & Co. v. Bailey, 214 N.Y.S. 675, 677, 127 Misc. 79.

Showing as to good faith and merits

Under some statutes, the test in determining right to relief in summary judgment proceedings is good faith and merits as disclosed by showing made.—Jackson Reinforced Concrete Pipe Co. v. Central Contracting & Engineering Co., 234 N.W. 111, 253 Mich. 157.

Resulting burdens

The rules cannot be changed merely because grave burdens will thereby be placed on individuals or institutions.—First Trust & Deposit Co. v. Potter, 278 N.Y.S. 847, 155 Misc. 106.

Failure to ask proper relief

As the duty of judges is to administer justice according to law, if counsel should inadvertently omit to ask what his client is entitled to demand in a summary proceeding, the court is nevertheless bound to award it to him, notwithstanding the omission.—Roth v. Steffe, 9 Lanc.Bar., Pa., 77.

Possibility of double liability

Summary judgment will not be denied on the ground that defendant may be subjected to a double liability where defendant can fully protect himself by an application for a stay of execution.—Jackson Reinforced Concrete Pipe Co. v. Central Contracting & Engineering Co., 234 N.W. 111, 253 Mich. 157.

Striking out of answer

An answer containing defenses or denials may be stricken out as sham or frivolous when the motion papers on a motion for summary judgment

stances require, the court will look through the form of a transaction to determine its true nature,[35] although it cannot inquire into the circumstances of the case except as they are revealed in the papers submitted.[36] The number of affidavits submitted on behalf of the respective parties is not controlling any more than the weight of the testimony on the trial of an action is governed by the number of witnesses.[37] The amount awarded by way of summary judgment should be consistent with that demanded and shown to be due,[38] and the various provisions of the judgment must be consistent with each other.[39] Where a motion by defendant for judgment on the pleadings has been granted, his motion for summary judgment is properly denied as academic.[40]

Determination of the issues should not be made piecemeal,[41] and the granting of a motion for summary judgment with respect to some of the issues has been held improper where there was no disposition of other issues.[42] However, where the proofs adduced on the motion show no issue as to the existence of some liability on the part of defendant, although they do present an issue as to the amount of liability, summary judgment may be granted on the issue of liability, with directions for the assessment of the amount of liability by trial or hearing;[43] but where a complaint demanding a liquidated amount is supported by the moving affida-make it appear that the answer falls within either category.—Commonwealth Fuel Co. v. Powpit Co., 209 N.Y.S. 603, 212 App.Div. 553.

Amendment of statement of claim

Where statement of claim was not in form required by statute, the court instead of entering summary judgment against plaintiff, should have permitted him to amend so as to make his cause of action clear.—Seaman v. Tamaqua Nat. Bank, 124 A. 323, 280 Pa. 124.

Default

Defendant was properly defaulted when absent from hearing on plaintiff's motion for judgment, and hence was not entitled to file demand for trial within seven days from order for judgment, and thus secure advance of case for speedy trial.—Norwood Morris Plan Co. v. McCarthy, 4 N.E.2d 450, 295 Mass. 597, 107 A.L.R. 1215.

36. N.Y.—First Trust & Deposit Co. v. Potter, 278 N.Y.S. 847, 155 Misc. 106.

Insertions in written contract

In action for breach of an alleged contract to convey property, on defendants' motion for summary judgment for nonexistence of a contract in writing, trial judge was not bound to insert in the agreement what was omitted but merely to ascertain and declare legal effect of contents of writings purporting to evidence contract.—Ajax Holding Co. v. Heinsbergen, 149 P.2d 139, 64 Cal.App.2d 665.

Erroneous item

Where computation in notice of motion for judgment on note showed on its face that plaintiff's claim included a certain item which was no part of note, court was without authority to enter office judgment for plaintiffs without deduction of such item irrespective of defendant's appearance.—Bacon v. Dettor, 33 S.E. 2d 648, 183 Va. 835.

Allowance previously credited

Defendant was not entitled to an allowance provided in contract, on plaintiff's recovering summary judgment for breach of contract, where it appeared that allowance had already been credited to defendant.—Lowenstern Bros. v. Marks Credit Clothing, 48 N.E.2d 729, 319 Ill.App. 71.

Assessment of damages on denial of motion

An order which denies plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, and at the same time sets the case down for trial for the purpose of assessing damages, is inconsistent.—R. K. L. Dresses v. Nationwide Packing & Shipping Service, 11 N.Y.S.2d 729, 171 Misc. 1.

Direction for trial after striking of answer

It is error for the court to direct that the answer be stricken out on a motion for summary judgment, leaving no issues whatever to be tried, and then to send the matter to another part of the court for trial.—Closson v. Seaboard Sand & Gravel Corporation, 265 N.Y.S. 160, 238 App. Div. 584, motion denied 189 N.E. 701, 263 N.Y. 568.

Undetermined plea in abatement

A decision granting a plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, made while a plea in abatement, for nonjoinder of necessary parties, remained open for judicial determination, was premature and judgment was a nullity.—Goucher v. Herr, 14 A.2d 651, 65 R.I. 246.

43. N.Y.—Reid v. Reid, 10 N.Y.S.2d 916, 170 Misc. 719—Kollsman v. Detzel, 55 N.Y.S.2d 491—President and Directors of Manhattan Co. v. Spier, 43 N.Y.S.2d 954.

Questions determinable at assessment

In action against liability insurer for failure to defend action against insured, amount of expenses incurred by insured in defending action, and whether settlement made was reasonably necessary, were questions which could properly be determined at an assessment ordered in connection with granting of insured's motion for summary judgment against insurer.—Krasilovsky Bros. Trucking Corp. v. Maryland Cas. Co., 54 N.Y.S.2d 60.

vit, and no issue with respect thereto has been raised by the answering affidavit, it is error to direct an assessment of damages.[44] The court may grant partial summary judgment for the amount established to be due, and may direct that the action be severed, and the case proceed in its usual course as to the balance of the claim.[45] It has been held that where defendant admits plaintiff's claim, but asserts a counterclaim, plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment only for the difference between his claim and the amount of defendant's counterclaim;[46] but it has also been held proper in such a case to award plaintiff judgment for the amount of his claim and allow the counterclaim to stand, to be disposed of in the usual course of practice.[47]

In some jurisdictions, on a motion by either party for summary judgment, the other party may have a judgment to which he shows himself to be entitled.[48] Thus summary judgment may be granted to plaintiff, notwithstanding the motion for summary judgment was made by defendant and plaintiff did not move therefor, where it appears that plaintiff is entitled to judgment.[49] Similarly summary judgment may be granted in favor of defendant dismissing the complaint, notwithstanding the motion for summary judgment was made by plaintiff.[50] Under the practice in other jurisdictions, however, the court is not authorized to dismiss the suit on striking plaintiff's affidavit for summary judgment from the files, in the absence of a motion by defendant for dismissal.[51]

Terms or conditions. It is within the discretion of the court, where justified by the circumstances, to deny or grant a motion for summary judgment on such terms as the justice of the case may require;[52] but, in the absence of circumstances warranting the imposition of terms or conditions, a motion for summary judgment must be granted or denied without condition.[53]

Decision as without prejudice or on the merits. In a proper case the court may deny the motion for summary judgment without prejudice to a new motion[54] or without prejudice to the right of the moving party to seek other appropriate relief.[55] It has been held that dismissal of a cause of action on defendant's motion for summary judgment may be made without prejudice to plaintiff's right to move for permission to serve an amended complaint;[56] but it has also been held that dismissal of the complaint without prejudice, on defendant's motion for summary judgment, is improper.[57] Where an action has been submitted to the court on a motion for summary judgment only, and has not been assigned for hearing on the merits, it is error for the court to dispose of the case on the merits after it appears that a decision necessarily involves the determination of a controverted issue of fact.[58]

Reconsideration or renewal of motion. The court may, before final judgment, reconsider its ruling on a motion for judgment.[59] It may grant reargument of the motion[60] and, in the interests of justice, may on reargument consider a new affidavit presented by a party as though it had been timely presented.[61] On denial of a motion for summary judgment for insufficiency of the affidavit submitted, leave may be granted to renew the motion on affidavits which comply with the statutes.[62] It has been held that where plaintiff's motion for summary judgment was denied and the case tried, he waived his right to move again for summary judgment.[63]

Costs. Notwithstanding denial of a motion for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff's affidavit is insufficient to support his cause of action, if defendant has failed to show sufficient facts to entitle him to defend, the motion should be denied without costs.[64]

Disposition of exhibits. Where exhibits are produced in court in support of a motion for summary judgment, the court on granting the motion may make suitable provision for their disposition.[65]

Construction and operation. It has been held that the validity of a summary judgment is to be determined by the sufficiency of the affidavits considered on the hearing of the motion.[66] Where the facts are undisputed, the decision on a motion for summary judgment is on the law.[67] An order which terminates plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and defendant's cross motion to dismiss the complaint, by grant of defendant's motion, by necessary inference denies the motion for summary judgment.[68] A dismissal as to one of the parties to a motion for judgment is not a discontinuance of the entire motion,[69] although the party dismissed was notified and has appeared and pleaded.[70]

§ 227. Form, Requisites, and Entry of Judgment

A summary judgment should show compliance with statutory requirements as to its form and entry, and should set forth those facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction and to support the judgment.

A summary judgment on motion must show on its face the existence or proof of all facts which were necessary to give the court jurisdiction and support the judgment.[71] It must show that there was compliance with all the statutory requirements,[72] such as that notice was given for the time and in the manner required[73] and that the motion was made at the proper time and place.[74] The court should not make findings of fact and conclusions of law on granting a motion for summary judgment.[75]

On the granting of a motion for summary judgment for plaintiff, it is better practice to enter an order striking out the answer and directing judgment,[76] with the result that there is an entry of

65. Safeguarding of notes

In an action on notes, where notes are produced in court in support of motion for summary judgment, the court on granting the judgment should require the notes to be marked as exhibits, or should seal the notes, or require them to be placed in a safe depositary to be retained under the order of the court and redelivered under like order to a person designated therein after final termination of a litigation.—General Inv. both an order and a judgment;[77] but such an order is not strictly necessary.[78]

Entry. Summary judgment must be entered by a person authorized so to do.[79] The entry of a decree by the clerk on the minutes of the court in a summary proceeding is the judgment;[80] and where, after such entry, defendant dies, the fact that it is signed during the term thereafter does not make it irregular.[81] If judgment is entered on the motion before the time as to which defendant was notified it is erroneous, but not void.[82]

X. AMENDING, CORRECTING, REVIEWING, OPENING, AND VACATING JUDGMENT

A. JURISDICTION AND POWER GENERALLY

§ 228. In General

Courts have inherent power to control, amend, open, and vacate their judgments under proper circumstances, although in some jurisdictions statutes regulate the courts' control of their judgments.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, courts, under proper circumstances, may control, amend, open, and vacate their own judgments.[83] This power is inherent and independent of statutes.[84] In some states it has been held that jurisdiction, at least with respect to certain courts, ceases with the rendition of the final judgment, and that thereafter the court has no power to amend or vacate the judgment except pursuant to statutory authority.[85]

Where the court is not justified in modifying or vacating a judgment, it may not accomplish the same result by indirection by refusing to enforce the judgment.[86]

Statutory provisions generally. In various jurisdictions statutes have been enacted which regulate the amendment, correction, opening, and vacation of judgments.[87] Some such statutes do not affect the inherent power and control of the court over its judgments,[88] while other statutes do.[89] In cases not within the statute, the common-law rules prevail.[90] Such statutes are remedial and should be

Repeal of statute

Statute providing that judgment shall not be set aside for irregularity on motion unless made within three years after term at which such judgment was rendered is not inconsistent, and therefore is not repealed by implication by civil code for practice and procedure in all courts enacted in 1943, or by harmonizing rules of supreme court.—Poindexter v. liberally construed,[91] although they cannot be extended beyond their legitimate purport.[92] Thus if they speak only of "defaults" they cannot be applied to final judgments otherwise rendered.[93] Statutes of this character should not be construed retrospectively.[94]

Under some of these statutes a court retains control of its judgments for a fixed period of time,[95] and a judgment may be amended, corrected, opened, or vacated only within the time so limited,[96] such as thirty days,[97] sixty days,[98] or six months[99] after the making or entry of the judgment or notice of the judgment, during the term, as considered infra § 229, or within a reasonable time, but not exceeding six months after judgment is taken.[1] The court may amend a judgment after the expiration of the statutory period as to matters of form[2] or where the judgment is interlocutory.[3] Where the judgment is void the court may vacate it after the expiration of the time fixed by statute.[4]

§ 229. During Term

At common law a court has full control over its orders or judgments during the term at which they are made, and may, on sufficient cause shown amend, correct, open, or vacate such judgments.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a court has full control over its orders or judgments during the term at which they are made, and may, on sufficient cause shown, in the exercise of its sound discretion, amend, correct, revise, supplement, open, or vacate such judgments, at least where the court is a court of general jurisdiction.[7]

This power is inherent and exists independently of any statute.[8] Unless previously adjourned sine die, every term continues until the beginning of the next for the purpose of this rule.[9] The power of the court extends, at least in cases tried without the intervention of a jury, to the hearing of additional testimony with respect to any part of the proceedings as to which the judge may entertain doubt.[10] The perfection of an appeal during the term does not deprive the court of this power.[11]

Statutory provisions. In some jurisdictions the statutes expressly provide that the judgment may be amended or vacated during the term at which it was entered.[12]

a. In General

In the absence of statutory authority, a court ordinarily has no power to correct, amend, open, or vacate a judgment after the expiration of the term.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, jurisdiction over the cause ceases with the expiration of the term at which final judgment is rendered[13] and thereafter the court has no power to correct or amend the judgment,[14] and a fortiori the Opening and vacating see infra §§ 265-310.

Reason for rule

(1) Basis of rule that court is without power to modify or vacate judgment in other than clerical matters after expiration of term in which it was rendered is that in interest of public as well as parties time must be fixed after expiration of which controversy is regarded as settled.—Foley v. George A. Douglas & Bro., 185 A. 70, 121 Conn. 377.

(2) Other cases see 34 C.J. p 212 note 12 [a].

Judgment should not be lightly set aside after expiration of term at which rendered.—Dunlap v. Villareal, Tex.Civ.App., 91 S.W.2d 1124.

Rule ordinarily refers to judgments recovered after trial or by default, where defendant has, or is treated as having, knowledge of judgment.—Denton Nat. Bank of Maryland v. Lynch, 142 A. 103, 155 Md. 333.

Time limit is not when right of exception expires, but rather is the end of the term.—Deen v. Baxley State Bank, 15 S.E.2d 194, 192 Ga. 300.

Where court did not enter judgment and prothonotary's entries were insufficient, rule that judgment cannot be disturbed after term of entry, except on appeal, does not control.—Trestrail v. Johnson, 146 A. 150, 297 Pa. 49.

Sufficiency of proceedings

(1) In absence of motion for new trial, district court's attempted modification of judgment, more than thirty days after rendition but in same term, could not form predicate for modification of judgment at subsequent term.—Hardy v. McCulloch, Tex.Civ.App., 286 S.W. 629.

(2) Motions to modify or to vacate a judgment, when not acted on during the term, have been held not to confer jurisdiction to modify or vacate at a subsequent term.—Hoffman v. Hoffman, 135 P.2d 887, 156 Kan. 647.

Motion for new trial

(1) Where a motion for a new trial is made and continued over the term, it suspends the finality of the judgment so that the court may modify or set it aside at a subsequent term.—Luther Lumber Co. v. Sheldahl Sav. Bank, 139 P. 433, 22 Wyo. 302.

(2) Pendency of motion for new trial does not authorize court to reopen cause at subsequent term for taking further evidence and entering another decree.—Irwin v. Burgan, 28 S.W.2d 1017, 325 Mo. 309.

Order within term suspending all proceedings to keep way open for further action was within court's discretion.—Stein v. Kessler, 92 Pa. Super. 359.

Exceptions to rule. There are various exceptions to the rule that jurisdiction of a court over its judgments terminates with the close of the term.[19] Clerical or formal corrections or amendments of the judgment record, necessary to make it speak the truth, and not involving any change in the judicial action already taken, may be made at any time, before or after expiration of the term.[20] Judgments entered as the result of clerical mistake or inadvertence,[21] or which are void on their face,[22] may be vacated after expiration of the term.

Where a judgment is irregular by reason of error or mistake of fact, such as was ground for a writ of error coram nobis, the practice in some jurisdictions permits it to be opened or vacated on motion after the term;[23] but this exception does not reach to facts submitted to a jury, or found by a referee or by the court sitting to try the issues.[24] In some cases equitable relief against the judgment has been granted in a summary way on motion after the term to avoid the expense and delay of a formal suit in equity.[25]

Statutes in some states confer on the court which rendered the judgment a prescribed and limited control over it after expiration of the term at which it was rendered.[26] Statutory judgments entered by the clerk, and which may be entered in vacation, are not within the general rule;[27] and it has been held that in statutory proceedings the judgment may be opened at a subsequent term where there is due diligence.[28]

Interlocutory judgments. The rule against amending or vacating a judgment after expiration of the term at which it was rendered has no application to interlocutory judgments, and such judgments may be opened, amended, or vacated at any time while the proceedings remain in fieri, and before the final judgment,[29] and a statute making such a judgment appealable does not change the rule.[30]

Removal of cause. When a cause is remanded to the state court after removal to a federal court, the state court again has the same jurisdiction it had at the time of removal, and may open, amend, or vacate a judgment notwithstanding the lapse of a term if it could have done so at the time of removal.[31]

Effect of improper amendment or vacation after term. According to some decisions any change or modification or attempted vacation of the judgment itself at a subsequent term is beyond the jurisdiction of the court and is void for that reason.[32] According to other decisions, however, where an improper amendment in a matter of substance has been made, the order making such amendment, while erroneous, is not void, and may not be assailed collaterally; the party aggrieved must seek his remedy by appeal from the order.[33]

b. Void Judgments

A judgment which is void for want of jurisdiction may be vacated at a subsequent term.

Where a judgment is entirely void for want of jurisdiction, the power to vacate it or set it aside is not limited to the term at which it was rendered, but may be exercised at a succeeding term,[34] subject to any existing statutory provisions.[35] A judgment of a court of last resort may not be set aside after the term on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction.[36]

c. Reservation of Power in Judgment

A reservation in the judgment of power to amend or vacate it at a subsequent term does not enlarge or extend the authority of the court.

An attempted reservation in the judgment itself of power to amend or vacate it at a subsequent term does not enlarge or extend the authority which the court otherwise has in that behalf.[37] A new or amended judgment rendered at a subsequent term pursuant to such reservation is without jurisdiction and void, and the prior judgment continues in force.[38]

d. Consent and Waiver

The authorities are in disagreement on the question whether or not a judgment rendered at one term of court can be set aside at a subsequent term by consent of both parties.

On the ground that consent cannot confer jurisdiction, it has been held that a judgment rendered at one term of court cannot be set aside at a subsequent term even by consent of both parties,[39] except where the judgment was entered by reason of a clerical mistake or inadvertence.[40] Other courts have held that, although a court may not amend or vacate its own final judgments after expiration of the term at which they were rendered without the consent of both parties, it may do so with such consent, and the second judgment in such cases is not void for want of jurisdiction.[41] Parties who consent to the amendment of a judgment have been held to be estopped from afterward objecting to it.[42] Appearance on application to amend judgment after term, however, has been held to confer no jurisdiction to make it.[43]

§ 231. Where Terms Abolished

Where terms of court have been abolished, relief against a final judgment may be had in the manner and within the time provided by statute.

Where terms of court are abolished, and the court is deemed to be continuously in session, as considered in Courts § 148, the general rule of control during the term, as discussed supra § 229, has no application,[44] and relief against a final judgment may be had only in the manner and within the time provided by statute,[45] except that judgments inadvertently or improvidently made, or prematurely entered, may be vacated under the inherent power of the court,[46] and judgments void on their face may be vacated at any time.[47]

§ 232. At Chambers or in Vacation

In the absence of statutory authority, a judgment ordinarily may not be amended, opened, or vacated at chambers or in vacation.

Except as to purely clerical amendments of the record,[48] the exercise of the power to amend, open, or vacate a judgment is a judicial act which, unless otherwise authorized by statute, must be performed in open court, in term time, and which cannot be done at chambers or in vacation.[49]

§ 233. Authority of Clerk

Unless authorized by statute, the clerk of court is without power to amend, correct, or vacate a judgment.

Except to the extent that permission may be given by statute,[50] the clerk of the court has no authority on his own responsibility and without an order or direction of the court to amend, change, or correct a judgment record.[51] A court may not delegate its judicial functions to its clerk so that he may set aside a judgment on the performance of a condition.[52]

§ 234. Judgments Subject to Amendment or Vacation

Various classes and kinds of judgments may be amended or vacated, but a void judgment, or a judgment which has been vacated, may not be amended.

In proper cases and for sufficient cause shown, various classes and kinds of judgments may be amended or vacated,[53] including, as considered infra §§ 321, 328–330, 333, judgments by confession, consent, or default.

Where the court does not render a formal or proper judgment, there is no judgment to vacate.[54] An unauthorized and void judgment may not be amended;[55] nor may a vacated judgment be amended.[56]

A judgment on demurrer, where proper grounds exist, may be vacated with leave to amend or plead over.[57]

Executed or satisfied judgments. In some jurisdictions a judgment may be opened, amended, or vacated for good cause, even after the amount of it has been collected by payment or by levy and sale on execution.[58] In other jurisdictions a judgment which has been paid or otherwise satisfied and discharged may not be amended,[59] modified,[60] or vacated.[61]

§ 235. Jurisdiction of Particular Courts and Judges

A judgment ordinarily may be amended, opened, or vacated only by the court by which it was rendered.

A judgment may not be amended or vacated by a court unless the court has jurisdiction.[62] As a general rule a judgment may be amended, opened, vacated, or set aside only by the court by which it was rendered.[63] A judge of that court, other than the one who presided at the trial and rendered the judgment, may order its amendment or vacation,[64] although, as a matter of practice, what amounts to an appeal from one judge to another coördinate judge will not be permitted in the absence of special circumstances.[65]

The jurisdiction of the proper court to amend the judgment is not affected by defendant's absence from the state, jurisdiction of his person having attached in the action,[66] or by the fact that similar relief has already been granted to a joint party.[67]

Courts of special or limited jurisdiction. Unless authority is conferred by statute, courts of special or limited jurisdiction have no power to review, retry, annul, or set aside their judgments.[68]

B. AMENDMENT AND CORRECTION

§ 236. In General

The general rule is that a court may amend its judgment as truth requires and the rules of law permit, so as to make it express what was actually decided or intended.

As a general rule, all courts whose judgments are preserved in any species of record or memorial have the power and authority to make such amendments and corrections therein as truth and justice require and the rules of law permit,[69] to the end that the

Amendment or modification held not shown

(1) It is not a modification of a judgment of partition, which directs the commissioners to proceed generally according to law, to give, in a subsequent order appointing new commissioners, specific instructions following the statute, as every judgment of partition contains the statutory directions by implication, if they are not expressed.—Houston v. Motion for modification not required

Where both plaintiff and defendant sought ejectment against the other and court entered judgment denying plaintiff relief but failed to pass on issues raised by defendant's pleading, plaintiff properly moved court to enter a final judgment and was not required to move for modification of judgment entered and thus invite error as moving court to find against him on issues tendered by his opponent.—State ex rel. Revision by lay judges

The court may change its decision on the day on which it is rendered, so that, treating the prior decree of president judge of court of common pleas of county as that of the court, it was still subject to revision as to facts by a majority of lay judges on the same day.—Petition of Murray, 105 A. 61, 262 Pa. 188.

In Iowa

(1) The power of the court to modify a judgment, when once entered, is purely statutory.—Hammon v. Gilson, 291 N.W. 448, 227 Iowa 1366—Workman v. District Court, Delaware County, 269 N.W. 27, 222 Iowa 364.

(2) "When a clear mistake of fact, due to misunderstanding honestly made, is presented to the court at the same term at which the entry is made, both statutory authority (section 10801, Code of 1935) and inherent power is [are] vested in the court to change, modify or even expunge the record."—Watters v. Knutsen, 272 N.W. 420, 422, 223 Iowa 225.

(2) "The power and authority of the court to correct an evident mistake is [are] not restricted either by section 11550 or sections 12787, 12790, and 12791, but . . . such power is inherent in the court, and [correction] may be made under such inherent power as well as under section 10803."—Murnan v. Schuldt, 265 N.W. 369, 373, 221 Iowa 242.

Mass.—Amory v. Kelley, 34 N.E.2d 507, 309 Mass. 162.

It has been held that in the case of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake relief must be granted by a court by the correction of its decrees, in the interests of justice;[73] and, under some authorities, a judgment procured through fraud, collusion, deceit, or mistake may be modified at any time, on a proper showing by the party injured.[74] However, the right of a court to modify its judgment is not limited to a showing that it was procured by fraud, collusion, or misrepresentation,[75] but it is sufficient if there is a showing that the rights of interested parties are prejudicially affected by the judgment, and if there was a withholding of matters which should have been before the court, but for which withholding the judgment would not have been rendered.[76]

Where amendments affecting the enforcement of a judgment or its application to the subject matter adjudicated may be made without relitigating former issues, no attack on the judgment is made.[77]

§ 237. Clerical and Formal Changes

The general rule is that clerical and formal errors in a judgment may be corrected, either during or after the term at which it was rendered.

The general rule is that the court, at any time either before or after the expiration of the term at which a judgment was rendered, may and should correct or amend clerical or formal errors and misprisions of its officers so as to make the record entry speak the truth and show the judgment which was actually rendered by the court;[78] and the

34 C.J. p 229 note 82.

"Irregular;" "irregularity"

(1) Under some statutes courts may modify their judgments or orders for irregularity in proceedings. —Vann v. Board of Education of Town of Lenapah, 229 P. 433, 102 Okl. 286.

(2) Under such statute, errors in permitting amendment of petition after judgment, in fixing amount of attorney's fees, and in rendering judgment on verdict, were held not grounds for modifying judgment on motion filed after expiration of term at which judgment was rendered.—Duncan v. Wilkins, 229 P. 801, 103 Okl. 221.

(3) An "irregular judgment" within meaning of statute providing that, for irregularity in obtaining a judgment, a district court has power to modify the judgment after expiration of the term at which the judgment was rendered is a judgment which is rendered contrary to the course of law and the practice of the courts.—Petersen v. Dethlefs, 298 N. W. 155, 139 Neb. 572.

(4) "Irregularity," within statute permitting modification of judgment by proceeding begun within three years for mistake, neglect, or omission of clerk, or irregularity in obtaining judgment or order, does not apply merely to acts of clerk or other ministerial officers, but includes case where court has acted on erroneous understanding of facts.—Phœnix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Aby, 61 P.2d 915, 144 Kan. 544, rehearing denied 64 P.2d 21, 145 Kan. 18.

Unavoidable casualty

Illness of litigant represented by counsel was not "unavoidable casualty or misfortune" within statute authorizing modification of judgment against litigant after expiration of term at which it was rendered for unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing litigant from appearing or defending, where nothing could have been done to protect litigant's rights while she was ill which could not have been done theretofore, and no continuance of hearings before commissioner because of her inability to be present was requested.—Washle v. Security Bank, 97 S.W.2d 823, 265 Ky. 808.

Negligence

Some statutes are not intended to relieve a party from the consequences of his own negligence.—Hickman v. Ritchey Coal Co., 252 Ill.App. 560.

Correctness of final judgment cannot be questioned on application for modification, in absence of error, fraud, or misrepresentation.—Bailey v. Gifford Sand & Gravel Co., La. App., 145 So. 712.

Errors correctible by writ of error coram nobis

(1) Under statutes providing that all errors of fact committed in proceedings of any court of record, which by common law could have been corrected by writ of error coram nobis, may be corrected by court in which error was committed on motion in writing made at any time within five years after the rendition of final judgment, "errors of fact" include duress, fraud, and excusable mistake, and fraud of opposing party or his counsel which prevents one from making his defense is such an error of fact.—Gunn v. Britt, 39 N.E.2d 76, 313 Ill.App. 13.

(2) Errors of fact which may be assigned under motion authorized by such statute must be as to facts, unknown to court, which would have precluded entry of judgment order.—Tylke v. Norwegian American Hospital, 54 N.E.2d 75, 322 Ill.App. 283.

(3) Writ of error coram nobis generally see infra §§ 311–313.

the progress of the case, which cannot reasonably be attributed to the exercise of judicial consideration or discretion.[80] Errors into which the court itself falls, however, have been said to be judicial errors,[81] and it has been said that an error in arriving at a conclusion cannot possibly be a clerical error, but must be a judicial one.[82] A mere arithmetical error, as in computation, may be corrected as a clerical error.[83]

The amendment of clerical errors after the term has been limited to situations in which the error has not misled, and does not prejudice, the party opposing the amendment.[84]

§ 238. Judicial and Substantial Changes

Subject to some exceptions, the general rule is that, after the term at which it renders a judgment, a court cannot amend it in a matter of substance or in a manner involving the exercise of judicial discretion on the merits.

After expiration of the term at which it was rendered, or of the statutory period of limitation, in cases governed by statute, a judgment is no longer open to any amendment, revision, modification, or correction which involves the exercise of the judgment or discretion of the court on the merits or on matters of substance.[85] The only amendment then permissible is one which is intended to make the

"Ordinarily, although originally and in its literal significance, a 'clerical error' is one that has been made by a clerk or some subordinate agent, latterly the meaning has been broadened and extended so that it now may include an error that may have been made by the judge or by the court."—In re Goldberg's Estate, 76 P.2d 508, 511, 10 Cal.2d 709.

Nature of clerical error

(1) "Such a mistake ordinarily is apparent upon the face of the record and capable of being corrected by reference to the record only. It is usually a mistake in the clerical work of transcribing the particular record. It is usually one of form. It may be made by a clerk, by counsel, or by the court. A clerical error in reference to an order for judgment or judgment, as regards correction, includes one made by the court which cannot reasonably be attributed to the exercise of judicial consideration or discretion."—Wilson v. City of Fergus Falls, 232 N.W. 322, 323, 181 Minn. 329.

(3) "Clerical misprision" defined generally see Clerical 14 C.J.S. p 1203 notes 53–60.

Expression of judicial desire or intention

Where judgment assigned by trial judge does not express the actual judicial desire or intention of the trial court, but is contrary thereto, the signing of such purported judgment is a clerical error rather than a judicial one.—Bastajian v. Brown, 120 P.2d 9, 19 Cal.2d 209.

Types of errors correctible

Mistakes in the names of the parties, dates, descriptions of lands, amounts, and others of similar character may be corrected on the court's own motion at any time, when it is clear from the whole record what the entry should be.

The reason for the rule is that if, on the application of one party, the court could change its judgment to the prejudice of the other, it could thereafter, on application of the latter, again change the judgment and continue this practice indefinitely.—Kline v. Murray, 257 P. 465, 79 Mont. 530.

Judgment rendered as intended becomes final and may be reviewed or corrected only on appeal or motion for new trial.—St. Onge v. Blakely, 245 P. 532, 76 Mont. 1.

Correction by trial court

Judicial error cannot be corrected by trial court except through new trial or on timely motion, where erroneous conclusions of law not consistent with findings have been

amendment.[88]

At common law, and in the absence of statute changing the rule, all proceedings of the court remain in the breast of the judge until the expiration of the term at which they were had, and, accordingly, it has been held or stated that a judgment may be amended and changed in matter of substance by the judicial action of the court, taken during the term at which such judgment was rendered;[89] but some authorities, without express reference to the term or time, deny the power of the court to correct a judicial error or omission, or to make a change in substance,[90] even where such drawn, or where judgment is inconsistent with special verdict.—Howland v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 16 P.2d 318, 127 Cal. App. 695.

Conformity to evidence, findings, or order

(1) Where a decree fails to conform to evidence, findings, or order, error may be corrected only on some seasonable and legally recognized proceeding for review.—Hill v. Taylor, Mass., 65 N.E.2d 97.

(2) If judgment conforms to finding, only remedy is by motion for new trial asking that finding and judgment be set aside.—S. J. Peabody Lumber Co. v. Northam, 184 N. E. 794, 96 Ind.App. 197—Tri Lake Const. Co. v. Northam, 184 N.E. 792, 96 Ind.App. 183.

Giving judgment over against another defendant

N.Y.—Terry & Gibson v. Bank of New York & Trust Co., 273 N.Y.S. 32, 242 App.Div. 699.

Inclusion of matters outside issues

Where judgment allegedly includes matters outside of issues, only remedy is by motion to modify judgment, designating changes desired, ruling on motion being assignable as error.—Rooker v. Fidelity Trust Co., 177 N.E. 454, 202 Ind. 641.

On opposition to administrator's final account, judge could not reverse or amend judgment to prejudice of administrator without giving him opportunity to be heard again by new trial.—Succession of Coreil, 148 So. 711, 177 La. 568.

Lapse of time for appeal or motion for new trial

A court has no jurisdiction to modify its judgment after time for appeal or motion for new trial has lapsed, except to correct clerical mistakes.—Johnson v. Superior Court in and for Yuba County, 87 P.2d 384, 31 Cal.App.2d 111.

(3) The same is true where the judgment is in accordance with the court's conclusions of law.—Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Muncie & Portland Traction Co., 91 N.E. 600, 174 Ind. 167—Old First Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Fort Wayne v. Snouffer, 192 N.E. 369, 99 Ind.App. 325.

(4) Trial court properly refused to modify judgment which followed finding of facts and conclusions of law laid down by court sitting without jury.—Griffith State Bank v. Clark, 199 N.E. 447, 101 Ind.App. 458.

(5) Where error in computation appeared in judgment, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, amended judgment correcting error was not supported by findings or conclusions.—Proctor v. Smith, 4 P.2d 773, 214 Cal. 227.

An error of law in judgment as originally entered cannot be corrected by amending judgment where entry made was the one intended to be made and was free from mistake other than error of law.—Amory v. Kelley, 34 N.E.2d 507, 309 Mass. 162.

Resettlement

(1) Resettlement is a procedure of correction or clarification and not a procedure to change or amplify the direction of the court, and is unavailable in a situation where object sought is an alteration of the decision actually made.—In re Chisholm's Estate, 30 N.Y.S.2d 870, 177 Misc. 423, affirmed 35 N.Y.S.2d 212, 264 App.Div. 793, appeal denied 37 N.Y.S. 2d 442, 264 App.Div. 956, affirmed 50 N.E.2d 239, 290 N.Y. 842—In re Bart-

change is for the purpose of meeting some supposed equity subsequently called to the court's attention or subsequently arising,[91] or newly ascertained provisions of law.[92] A new adjudication on an issue not previously disposed of cannot be made in the guise of an amendment of a judgment.[93]

A court cannot correct a judicial error under the guise of correcting or rectifying a clerical one;[94] but it has full power to determine whether an alleged error is clerical or judicial in character.[95] It has been said to be difficult, often, to draw the distinction between the two types of error,[96] but that the distinction is not dependent on the source of the error.[97] The court has been held not precluded from determining whether an error is judicial or clerical by the fact that the judgment follows the findings of fact and conclusions of law;[98] but it has also been held that, where the judgment accords with the findings, any omission, if error, is a judicial, rather than a clerical, error.[99]

Exceptions to rule. The rule against rectification of judicial error after the term has been said to obtain except in exceptional circumstances.[1] Thus, according to some decisions, when it clearly appears what judgment should have been rendered as of course on the facts in the record, the court will assume to treat the failure to render such judgment as a mere clerical misprision, and will amend the judgment so as to make it conform to that which should have been rendered on the facts.[2] Likewise, directions for carrying a judgment into effect, which do not change or modify the judgment with respect to matters put in issue and determined by the judgment, may be inserted or modified by amendment.[3]

lett's Will, 299 N.Y.S. 316, 164 Misc. 524.

(2) When properly performed, the act of resettlement of a decree is merely the exercise of the court's inherent authority to alter its formal pronouncements in cases in which the initial instrument of adjudication is shown to have been the result of mistake or inadvertence.—In re Bartlett's Will, supra.

(3) Where decree as originally entered correctly reflected the decision of the court, there was no authority for its resettlement.—In re Putnam's Will, 17 N.Y.S.2d 238, 173 Misc. 151.

(4) In order to obtain an alteration of a decision actually made, there must be an actual vacatur of the order or decree in question, and not merely a resettlement of such order or decree.—In re Chisholm's Estate, supra.

§ 239. Particular Amendments and Corrections

The application of the general rules governing the amendment or correction of judgments, considered supra §§ 236–238, to particular types of amendment or correction is treated infra §§ 240–249.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 240. —— Supplying Omissions Generally

Matter which is properly part of a judgment, and was so intended, but was negligently or inadvertently omitted, may be supplied by amendment, even after the term.

If anything has been omitted from the judgment which is necessarily or properly a part of it, and which was intended and understood to be a part of it, but failed to be incorporated in it through the negligence or inadvertence of the court or counsel, or the clerk, the omission may be supplied by an amendment, even after the term.[4] If the proposed addition is a mere afterthought, and formed no part of the judgment as originally intended and pronounced, it may not be brought in by way of amendment.[5]

§ 241. —— Striking Out Improper or Erroneous Entries

Matter improperly included in a judgment may be stricken out by amendment.

The power of amendment may be employed to strike out surplusage or other matter improperly included in a judgment.[6]

§ 242. —— Recitals in General

Errors of omission, inclusion, or description of parties in a judgment may generally be corrected by amendment, provided new parties, not previously before the court, are not brought in, and the judgment is not changed in substance.

Where a judgment entry fails to correspond with the record in consequence of a clerical error or inadvertence, which makes it include more or fewer parties than it should, it may be amended by striking out the names of those erroneously added,[15] or inserting the names of those improperly omitted.[16] A judgment may be corrected, with respect to the parties, so as to conform to the verdict.[17] It may even be permissible, where necessary to carry out the purpose of the judgment, to substitute one party for another as plaintiff or defendant,[18] or to correct the entry of judgment, through inadvertence, for the wrong party.[19] The power of amendment, however, cannot be employed to bring within the judgment new parties, who were not previously before the court,[20] or for the purpose, or with the effect, of changing the substance and effect of the judgment as to the parties who were before the court.[21]

(1) Trial court was authorized to amend original judgment against one of three defendants "et als." by rendering second judgment naming all defendants in action, so that execution issued thereon would be valid.—Glen Falls Indemnity Co. v. Manning, La.App., 168 So. 787.

(2) However, judgment against a named defendant "et al.," based on a decision directing judgment against "defendant," without specifying which defendant was intended, cannot be amended so as to name specifically each of defendants.—Marc v. Pinkard, 230 N.Y.S. 765, 133 Miss. 83.

Defendant not cast in original judgment

Under the general law, a definitive judgment cannot be amended by rule to condemn a party defendant who by inadvertence was not cast in the original judgment.—Jefferson v. Laure N. Truck Line, La.App., 181 So. 821, affirmed Jefferson v. Lauri N. Truck Lines, 187 So. 44, 192 La. 29—State ex rel. Sehrt v. Registrar of Conveyances, 129 So. 197, 14 La. App. 30.

Partnership or members thereof

(2) Judgment in favor of partnership was properly amended by substituting individual names of plaintiffs as recovering judgment, where original amended petition showed dissolution of partnership and that plaintiffs seeking to recover were surviving partner and widow of deceased partner, individually and as independent executrix of his estate.—Bridges v. Wilder, Tex.Civ.App., 72 S.W.2d 644.

Joint or several right

(1) The erroneous entry of a joint judgment does not preclude plaintiff from applying for and having a several judgment against defendants.—Leese v. Clark, 28 Cal. 26.

(2) Where auditor's findings and judgment thereon were for plaintiffs severally, and execution was in favor of plaintiffs jointly and severally, amendment of judgment in favor of plaintiffs jointly and severally was unauthorized.—Kicklighter v. Burkhalter, 170 S.E. 75, 177 Ga. 187.

(3) Where clerk inadvertently entered a several judgment against each defendant when in fact verdict correctly construed was a joint and several judgment and should have been entered against both defendants, nunc pro tunc order correcting entry of judgment was not an order vacating a previous judgment, but was merely an order for correction of clerical mistake in original entry, so that court had jurisdiction to make order, although judgment had become final.—Phipps v. Superior Court in and for Alameda County, 89 P.2d 698, 32 Cal.App.2d 371.

be cured by amendment,[22] as may an error in the description of the attorney.[23]

Personal or representative capacity. A judgment entered against a party in a representative capacity, when it should have been against him individually, or vice versa, or a personal judgment against an executor or administrator which should have been against the goods of the estate, may be cured by amendment when the mistake was clerical, but not where the error was judicial.[24]

Remission against one or more defendants. By consent, the court, after judgment in an action of trespass to try title, may reform the judgment and permit plaintiff to dismiss or remit the judgment against one or more of several defendants.[25]

§ 245. —— Process and Appearance

A recital in a judgment as to the issuance or service of process, or as to appearance, may be amended to make it conform to the facts or to make it more explicit.

An erroneous recital in a judgment with respect to the issuance or service of process may be amended to make it conform to the actual facts, or to make it more explicit;[26] and recitals as to appearance likewise may be amended.[27] A fault, however, which is not in the statements or recitals of the record, but in the writ or process itself, cannot be amended, being a jurisdictional defect.[28]

§ 246. —— Relief Awarded in General

A judgment may be amended with respect to the relief granted so as to carry out the court's intention, as by correcting clerical or formal mistakes; but correcting judicial errors after the term, or granting relief other than that originally intended, may not be accomplished by amendment.

With respect to the extent and character of the relief granted, if the judgment entered does not correspond with that actually intended and pronounced by the court, it may be amended to carry out the court's intention,[29] by correcting any clerical mistake,[30] by supplying matters inadvertently omitted,[31] by striking out clauses erroneously inserted,[32] or by making merely formal or insubstantial changes,[33] such as are necessary to make the judgment conform to the pleadings,[34] verdict,[35]

Where judgment of dismissal was predicated on pendency of suit before railroad commission, amendment, making dismissal without prejudice to bringing of another suit, was not erroneous, as it added nothing to original judgment.—Marine Production Co. v. Shell Oil Co., Tex.Civ.App., 146 S.W.2d 1024.

findings,[36] conclusions of law,[37] and agreements of the parties.[38]

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[39] it has generally been held that there is no power to amend by correcting a judicial mistake or error of law, at least after the term at which the judgment is rendered.[40] Also a court may not grant relief in addition to,[41] or in lieu of,[42] that originally contemplated and intended to be given, or change the rights of the parties as fixed by the original decision,[43] or adjudicate a matter which might have been, but was not, considered and determined on the trial.[44]

Medium of payment. An amendment in the provision of a judgment designating the medium of payment may be allowed in a proper case.[45]

§ 247. —— Amount of Recovery and Allowance of Interest

A judgment may be amended in order to correct clerical mistakes as to the amount or interest recoverable so as to make it conform to the record and the court's intention; but judicial errors with respect to such matters may not be corrected by amendment, at least after the term.

An amendment of a judgment is proper where the clerk in entering the judgment has omitted to insert the sum recovered.[46] If, in consequence of a clerical error[47] or miscalculation on the part of the clerk or the court,[48] the amount of the recovery in a judgment is stated at a wrong sum, the judgment may be amended to conform to the truth. Where, however, the amount of a judgment is wrong because of a judicial error in fixing the amount, it cannot be amended after the term,[49] although, dur-

Verdict by implication

Jury's failure to mention employee in verdict against employer was in law equivalent of a verdict for employee, and trial court should have granted motion to amend judgment to provide that complaint be dismissed as against employee.—Thibodeau v. Award to one not party

Where vendor was not party to suit in which court awarded proportionate share of rents to him and during pendency of which purchaser bought vendor's interest, mistake in making award to vendor instead of purchaser was held not to authorize correction of judgment.—Bell v. ing the term such errors have been held correctible.[50]

In accordance with the foregoing rules, an amendment may be made, particularly where plaintiff remits the excess,[51] in a case in which the amount of the judgment is in excess of that claimed by plaintiff in his pleadings,[52] or is in excess of the sum found by the verdict,[53] or findings,[54] or ordered by the court,[55] or is larger than the total which limits the jurisdiction of the court,[56] or is excessive in consequence of the failure to allow proper credits.[57]

A rule similar to that followed in the case of excessive judgments, applies where through inadvertence or mistake the judgment is entered for too small an amount,[58] as where it is for less than appears on the face of the obligation in suit,[59] or less than the amount admitted to be due by defendant's pleadings.[60]

In some jurisdictions the statutes contain express provisions governing the correction of the amount awarded in a judgment.[61]

Liability of codefendants

(1) Judgment ordering full recovery against each of a number of defendants requires reformation to provide that any sum paid by any defendant shall to that extent satisfy judgment against other defendants. —First Nat. Bank v. Slaton Independent School Dist., Tex.Civ.App., 58 S.W.2d 870, error dismissed.

(2) Where judgment was entered against both owner and operator of motor vehicle for five thousand dollars and twelve thousand five hundred dollars, respectively, and costs, it should be modified so as to prevent collection of more than twelve thousand five hundred dollars and costs, and to show that owner's statutory liability depended on nonpayment by operator.—O'Neill v. Necessity of pleading credit item

Fact that judgment includes allowances for work done by plaintiff for defendant on Sunday is not ground for modifying it, issue of right to pay for Sunday work not having been raised by the pleadings.—Mosing v. Bankers' Oil Co., 212 P. 115, 112 Kan. 575.

Allowance for prior recovery

Where bonds, secured by trust deed, had already been basis of personam judgment obtained by bondholder, subsequent deficiency judgment, obtained by trustee in foreclosure suit, for entire debt, less proceeds of foreclosure sale, was excessive to extent of first recovery and could have been corrected.—Doerr v. Schmitt, 31 N.E.2d 971, 375 Ill. 470.

Effect of code provision

Amendment of judgment, holding defendants liable for rent for balance of term, after abandonment of premises by them, is not necessary to give them credit, to which they are entitled for rent collected by plaintiff for such period from new tenants, as under the code such credit may be urged as a set-off against the judgment itself, in reduction and partial compensation thereof.—Meriwether v. omission of a provision for interest,[64] may be corrected by an amendment; and the court may correct its judgment so as to show the rate of interest[65] and the date from which interest is to run.[66] However, judicial error in passing on the right to interest,[67] or in fixing the amount of interest to be recovered,[68] or in failing to make any provision for interest in the judgment,[69] cannot be corrected by amendment, at least after the term.

In determining whether an amendment of the award of interest is proper, courts will consider whether the correction will conform the judgment to the verdict,[70] and to the findings.[71]

§ 248. —— Costs and Allowances

A clerical error or omission as to the costs in a judgment may be corrected by amendment; but errors of substance in the allowance of costs or attorneys' fees may not be amended after the term.

A clerical error[72] or omission[73] with respect to the costs to be included in the judgment may be corrected by amendment. It is not permissible, however, by an amendment after the term, to add to the judgment costs which were not originally allowed or within the purview of the original judgment,[74] or to reconsider or review the allowance

Amendment after term
(1) Where judgment has been rendered for principal, interest, and costs, without specifying any amounts, but they are determinable by inspection of record, including pleadings and verdict, without resort to extraneous proof, judgment may be amended at a subsequent term by inserting the several amounts thus shown to be due.—Bank of Tupelo v. Collier, 15 S.E.2d 499, 192 Ga. 409.

Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 16 P. 2d 318, 127 Cal.App. 695.

70. Objection to verdict necessary

Stipulation binding on parties
Where attorneys for plaintiff and defendant drew and signed stipulation that judgment should be entered for plaintiff for one hundred dollars "without costs" and judgment was entered by clerk for one hundred two dollars, including two dollars clerk fees, trial court on defendant's motion properly reduced the judgment to one hundred dollars.—Berthiaume v. Allowances for attorneys' fees. Error with respect to the allowance of attorneys' fees may be presented by motion to modify the judgment.[77] Such allowances are also subject to the rule that the correction of other than clerical or formal errors, by amendment, is limited to the term at which the judgment is rendered.[78]

§ 249. —— Other Errors or Defects

The general rules governing the amendment of judgments have been applied to various particular types of amendments or corrections, such as those relating to the cure of ambiguity, date of judgment, signature, and description of property.

In addition to the amendments and corrections discussed supra §§ 240–248, under the general rules governing the amendment and correction of judgments particular amendments have been permitted or have been held proper,[79] or have been not permitted or have been held improper.[80]

Dismissal without prejudice

(1) Under some statutes trial court was without power to amend judgment of dismissal by inserting

Curing ambiguity. Independently of statute,[81] a judgment may be amended so as to cure it of ambiguity or remove the possibility of confusion.[82]

Date of judgment. An error in the date of rendition of a judgment is amendable,[83] even at a subsequent term,[84] so as to make it express the true date. It has been held, however, that the date on which the judgment is entered is not a part of the judgment, and that it is a fact which the court cannot correct.[85]

Signature. The required signature of the judge or clerk may be supplied by amendment;[86] and the defect of an intervening space between the end of the judgment and the judge's signature may be corrected at any time.[87]

Description of property. Where a description of the land or other property involved is omitted from a judgment, or where such description is erroneous or uncertain, it may be inserted or corrected by amendment.[88]

Conforming judgment to pleadings. A judgment may be reformed or amended so as to conform to the pleadings.[89]

Co., 248 N.Y.S. 375, 232 App.Div. 43—Commercial Motors Mortg. Corporation v. Mack International Motor Truck Corporation, 209 N.Y.S. 661, 213 App.Div. 25.

Specifying parties
(1) Where it appeared that, although judgment was entered in favor of one defendant, judgment was erroneously entered against "defendants" without specifying them, judgment file could be corrected.—Sachs v. Feinn, 183 A. 384, 121 Conn. 77.

(2) Parties generally see supra § 244.

Double recovery
Judgment for plaintiffs which was ambiguous and could be construed as permitting double recovery was required to be amended to remove ambiguity.—Coluccio v. State, 64 P.2d 786, 189 Wash. 236.

Ownership of property
In suit for damages resulting from conversion of furniture, where defendants were shown to be the owners of items of furniture described in their answer and in the judgment, defendants were entitled to have the judgment amended so as to leave no doubt of defendants' ownership of such items.—Turner v. Charlton, La. App., 197 So. 187.

Conformity to description in pleading
Court has authority at any time to correct misdescription of lands contained in judgment, where pleadings and proof correctly describe land in question; but erroneous description of land which was in accordance with description referred to in complaint cannot be corrected as clerical error, since the judgment correctly expresses the decision of the court.—Oregon Mortg. Arnold, 234 P. 1003, 118 Kan. 389.

§ 250. Procedure and Relief

A judgment once entered must be corrected, if irregular or erroneous, by some proper proceeding for that purpose.

A judgment once entered must be corrected, if irregular or erroneous, by some proper proceeding for that purpose; it cannot be merely disregarded and the proper judgment entered anew.[90] A judgment once regularly signed or entered may be modified or altered by the court which entered it only in the manner, if any, prescribed by statute.[91]

Substantial or judicial errors, as discussed supra § 238, are generally to be corrected by a motion for a new trial or by appeal or writ of error, or they may be amended under appropriate statutory procedure,[92] or, after the term, by independent action;[93] and it has been held that the correction cannot be made on the court's own motion.[94]

Merely formal or clerical errors in the judgment as entered are to be corrected by amendment in the trial court, and not by writ of error or appeal from the judgment;[95] and they may be corrected on motion or at the instance of the parties.[96] During the term at which the judgment was rendered, the

Improper recital of dismissal on merits

Motion as not suggestion of error

In order to include material elements left out through error or oversight, judgment may be corrected on motion; and such motion is not a suggestion of error.—Huckaby v. Jenkins, 122 So. 487, 154 Miss. 378.

Securing costs

Where defendant in law action was entitled to recover statutory costs as matter of course, and judgment was entered for plaintiff and was satisfied, proper procedure to secure costs for defendant was by motion to amend judgment and not by the entry of second judgment for costs.—Coffee v. Johnson, 24 N.Y.S.2d 588.

In Indiana

(1) The office of a motion to modify judgment is to make the judgment conform to the verdict or finding.—Wise v. Layman, 150 N.E. 868, 197 Ind. 393—Blagetz v. Blagetz, 37 N.E.2d 318, 109 Ind.App. 662—First State Bank of Frankfort v. Spradling, 11 N.E.2d 76, 104 Ind.App. 342—Hinton v. Bryant, 190 N.E. 554, 99 Ind.App. 38—Moore v. correction may be made by an order of the court on a mere suggestion of the error.[97] Under a number of authorities, the court may act of its own motion, without application by a party,[98] although some authorities restrict this power to the term[99] and hold that after the term the amendment can be made only on the presentation of a formal petition or motion,[1] entitled and filed in the action or proceeding in which the judgment was rendered.[2]

A motion in the cause, as distinguished from an independent action, is generally the proper remedy to obtain an amendment of a judgment,[3] and such

(3) Such a motion may be used to correct some matter of form in judgment, but not to secure the substitution of a different one.—Blagetz v. Blagetz, supra—Hinton v. Bryant, supra.

(5) Remedy against an erroneous or improper judgment is a motion to modify the judgment, not a motion for a new trial.—Smith v. Hill, 165 N.E. 911, 200 Ind. 616—Edwards v. Wiedenhaupt, 32 N.E.2d 106, 109 Ind.App. 450.

(6) Remedy against judgment not within issues, and which did not follow findings, was held to be a motion to modify the judgment and not a motion for a new trial.—Fisher v. Rosander, 151 N.E. 12, 84 Ind.App. 694—34 C.J. p 243 note 59 [e].

Duty of court
If a court is made aware that through mistake or omission its records do not recite its judgment as actually rendered, it is not only the right but the duty of the court, of its own motion, to order the proper entry.—Coleman v. Zapp, 151 S.W. 1040, 105 Tex. 491—Magnolia Petroleum Co. v. Wheeler, Tex.Civ.App., 132 S.W.2d 456, error dismissed, judgment correct.

If a judgment is irregular, remedy is by motion in the case made within a reasonable time.—Nall v. McConnell, 190 S.E. 210, 211 N.C. 258.

Remedy after statutory period
Where invalidity of a judgment is apparent from the record so that the court rendering it, in the absence of an application within six months after its rendition for relief from mistake, is powerless to modify the judgment, the sole remedy of the aggrieved party is by a new action.—People ex rel. Pollock v. Bogart, 138 P.2d 360, 58 Cal.App.2d 831.

Motion to bring forward suit
Usual form of procedure where a correction of record of judgment is sought is a motion to bring forward the suit and to correct the judgment entry therein; suit by plaintiff to amend record of judgment against nonresident motorist and another for damages growing out of accident or collision could be treated as a motion to bring forward the law action for the correction of the judgment entry therein.—Hubley v. Goodwin, 4 A.2d 665, 90 N.H. 54.

Suit constituting collateral attack
(1) Under some statutes an error of form of a judgment in replevin is not rectifiable in suit constituting collateral attack on such judgment.—Fore v. Chenault, 271 S.W. 704, 108 Ark. 747.

(2) Collateral attack generally see infra §§ 401–435.

Separate suit as not abridging rights
Fact that party seeking to have alleged error in judgment corrected brought separate suit instead of proceeding by motion in original suit as apparently contemplated by statute, was held not to abridge his rights.—Bell v. Rogers, Tex.Civ.App., 58 S. W.2d 878.

Trial of issue on claim of property
Where original judgment on the merits had become final by reason of the fact that no appeal had been taken therefrom, such judgment was not amendable on the trial of claimant's issue pursuant to statutory affidavit claiming property before sale under levy.—Spencer v. Marmon, 126 So. 824, 156 Miss. 729.

In Illinois
(1) The practice and procedure under Pract.Act § 89, stating the manner in which all errors in fact committed in the proceeding of any court of record may be corrected, are similar in most respects to the practice under the writ of error coram nobis; the motion under § 89 is treated substantially as the petition or motion for the common-law writ, and is the beginning of a new suit, and the sufficiency of the motion notion is to be disposed of in a summary manner without formal pleadings,[4] although formal pleadings and process, if resorted to, may and should be regarded as constituting merely a written motion and notice.[5] However, in some jurisdictions, the amendment may be obtained by action, the same as on motion in the original cause,[6] although, of course, an action cannot take the place of an appeal as a means for the correction of erroneous judgments.[7]

Where a judgment is incomplete, in not going as far as the pleadings demand, the remedy has been held to be by motion to modify.[8]

Error in entering judgment after trial for more than the amount demanded has been held correctible on motion or by appeal.[9]

§ 251. —— Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction over the amendment of judgments is discussed generally supra §§ 228–235, and the jurisdiction of particular courts and judges supra § 235.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 252. —— Time for Application

An application to amend a judgment must be made within the time prescribed by statute unless it invokes the inherent power of the court to amend its judgments. Laches may defeat the application.

Any statutory limitation of the time within which an application to amend or correct a judgment may be made must be observed in all applications made under, and within the operation of, the statute.[10] It has been held that, where a judgment becomes final at the end of a specified period, an application to amend or correct errors must be filed before the lapse of that time.[11]

Where an application for the amendment of a judgment is not made under statute, or on statutory grounds, but invokes the inherent power of the court to amend its judgments, the statutory limitation is generally deemed not applicable,[12] and the power of the court to correct or amend in proper cases is not lost by mere lapse of time, the expiration of the term, or the time for appeal.[13] However, judicial errors, unlike clerical mistakes, may not be corrected at any time and the appli-may be raised by demurrer, or an issue of fact may be raised by plea denying the truth of the error in fact alleged.—Smyth v. Fargo, 138 N.E. 610, 307 Ill. 300.

(2) Motion to correct judgment to include statutory damages, however, need not be filed within time for filing suggestions of error.—Huckaby v. Jenkins, supra.

Statute held applicable

(1) Where it did not appear satisfactorily that a clerical error was made and all-important witnesses, including the judge, were dead, it was held that failure to take steps within the statutory period to amend a judgment was a bar, and the court had no inherent power to amend.—Application of Beaver Dam Ditch Co., 93 P.2d 934, 54 Wyo. 459.

(2) Where the error was in no way disclosed in the record, and there was no clerical error and no difference between the judgment and the record, it was held that the statutory limitation applied and the court did not have inherent power to correct or amend the judgment.—Goatman v. Fuller, 216 P. 35, 191 Cal. 245.

cation must be made seasonably, in accordance with statutory or code provisions.[14]

Laches or undue delay in making application for the amendment of a judgment is ground for denial of the application,[15] particularly where rights have vested under the judgment as entered which would be disturbed by its alteration.[16] Mere delay explained and excused is not fatal to the application;[17] but a prima facie case of laches and delay must be excused to warrant relief.[18]

Although an application to amend or correct a judgment has been held timely if filed while the execution is in the hands of the sheriff,[19] generally an application to amend a judgment is too late after the amount of it has been paid, especially if the amendment would make a party liable to pay it a second time.[20]

§ 253. —— Parties

An application for the amendment of a judgment must be made by one entitled to such relief; and all parties whose rights or interests may be affected by the amendment should be made parties to the application.

An application for the amendment of a judgment must be made by one entitled to such relief.[21] It has variously been held that the application may be made by either litigant,[22] by the party for or against whom judgment has been given,[23] by anyone injuriously affected,[24] by a defendant, to determine rights as between him and a codefendant,[25] and by persons not parties whose vested rights would be affected;[26] but it has also been held that only the parties to a judgment may apply,[27] except that, where the rights of one not a party are directly and necessarily affected, he may intervene after judgment and have his rights protected.[28] A person who suffers no loss by a judgment has been held to have no right to a modification thereof.[29]

All the parties to the judgment whose rights or interests may be affected by the proposed amendment should be made parties to the application therefor;[30] but persons whose rights are not affected need not be joined.[31]

§ 254. —— Notice

It is a general rule that a judgment cannot be materially amended, especially after the term, unless due and proper notice of the application for amendment has been given to the opposite party; but notice is not required for clerical amendments based on matters appearing in the record.

As a general rule a judgment cannot be amended in a material particular unless due and proper notice of the application for amendment has been given to the adverse, interested, or affected parties, so that they may have an opportunity to appear and show cause against the proposed correction;[32] but it has been held that, in order to make a judgment as entered conform to the judicial decision actually made, the court may correct the judgment with or without notice,[33] although in this situation notice has also been required.[34] It has been held that an amendment may be made without notice during the same term at which the judgment was rendered,[35] but that notice[36] or voluntary appearance[37] is necessary to an amendment at a subsequent term. It has also been held that formal or clerical amendments, based entirely on matters appearing in the record,[38] or resting in the recollection of the judge,[39] may be made without notice, but that amendments based on evidence aliunde may be

After final decree, entry of supplemental order without notice to, and in absence of, parties in interest, and proceedings thereunder, were void.—First Nat. Bank v. Webb, 158 S.E. 378, 110 W.Va. 387.

Entry of remittitur

Court did not err in permitting plaintiff to enter remittitur of part of judgment for him without notice to defendant.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Morrow, Tex.Civ.App., 66 S. W.2d 481, error dismissed.

Person without adverse interest

The statute requiring reasonable notice to be given to adverse party of proceedings to correct irregularity in obtaining judgment is for purpose of protecting one's adverse interest and notice is not required to be given to one whose interest cannot possibly be adverse to the result to be accomplished.—Franklin v. Hunt Dry Goods Co., 123 P.2d 253, 190 Okl. 396.

Ex parte amendment held proper

(1) In an action in which the court in rendering judgment erroneously described defendant, there was no error in directing the clerk to strike out the name improperly used and insert defendant's name, without citing defendant to show cause why the correction should not be made, as the error was of little or no importance.—Town of Mandeville v. Paquette, 95 So. 391, 153 La. 33.

(2) An order amending judgment on plaintiff's ex parte application so as to render liable a defendant who had appeared and filed answer and had been held not liable to plaintiff, although he had not taken part in trial, was valid.—Kohlstedt v. Hauseur, 74 P.2d 314, 24 Cal.App.2d 60.

Under statute

(1) Under some statutes the proper method of correcting clerical misprision is by motion on reasonable notice to adverse party or his attorney.—Stratton & Terstegge Co. v. Begley, 61 S.W.2d 287, 249 Ky. 632.

(2) Also under some statutes a mistake or omission of the clerk in entering judgment on the journal may be corrected by motion on reasonable notice during or after term at which judgment was rendered.—Hurley v. Childers, 243 P. 218, 116 Okl. 84.

39. Cal.—Carpenter v. Pacific Mut.

made only after notice, and that, in the absence of notice, the proceedings for amendment or correction are void.[40]

Other authorities have held that during the same term and before the judgment has been entered of record, the court may change its rulings of its own motion and without notice, and direct a different judgment,[41] but that after the judgment has been entered the court may not change the record without notice even at the same term.[42]

The notice, if required, must be sufficient in form and substance to inform the party of the time and purpose of the proceeding.[43] Written notice is not always required;[44] and actual notice may supply the place of formal notice.[45] Appearance at the hearing waives the absence of, or defects in, the notice of the application.[46] Service of notice must be on the party or his attorney of record.[47]

Where the time of notice is prescribed by statute or rule of court, failure to give the required notice may be fatal to the order amending the judgment.[48]

§ 255. —— Contents and Sufficiency of Application

An application for amendment of a judgment should specify the errors or omissions complained of and the correction desired, and should state a sufficient ground for the modification asked.

A petition or motion for the amendment or correction of a judgment should set forth clearly and specifically the nature of the errors or omissions complained of, and the terms of the correction desired;[49] an application which states no ground or reason for the modification asked, or an insufficient one, is properly overruled.[50]

Service on attorney after final judgment
The notice of application to correct a final judgment may be given to the attorney who appeared for adverse party in the original action or proceeding, notwithstanding the final termination thereof, since the authority of an attorney does not necessarily terminate on the entry of judgment but he is regarded as still representing the party for the purpose of receiving notices of motion or other appropriate process.—Langrick v. Rowe, 32 N.Y.S.2d 328, affirmed 41 N.Y.S.2d 82, 265 App.Div. 793, affirmed 52 N.E.2d 964, 291 N. Y. 756.

Statute requiring reasonable notice
Notice of hearing of motion to amend judgment given by registered mail and received a reasonable time before hearing, which was attended by defendant who made due objection and formal protest, constituted "reasonable notice" within statute authorizing correction of judgments.—Luck v. Motion to correct journal entry of judgment by clerk was not insufficient in failing to allege that error was due to clerk's mistake or omission.—Hurley v. Childers, 243 P. 218, 116 Okl. 84.

Where rule seeks modification of postea, reasons for such modification must be set forth in statement of case.—Fantauzzo v. Phœnix Assur. Co. of London, 155 A. 749, 9 N.J.Misc. 713.

Verification
Failure of plaintiff to swear to motion to correct record of judgment erroneously entered was immaterial. —Greggers v. Gleason, 29 S.W.2d 183, 224 Mo.App. 1108.

Agreement of parties as to referee's findings
Correction of judgment entered on report of referee, settling controversy on count on note, to show that parties had agreed that referee's findings should not pertain to count on note, could be made at term at which judgment was rendered, on motion to correct entry and judgment, as against contention that matter could only be presented by motion for new trial, or under statutes relating to vacation or modification of judgments, since such statutes had reference to proceedings instituted after term at which judgment was entered.—Watters v. § 256. —— Evidence; Source of Amendment or Correction

While some authorities hold that a judgment may be amended on any satisfactory extrinsic evidence, other authorities hold that an amendment after the term must be based on evidence in the record, or matter in the nature of record. During the term, an amendment may be based on any satisfactory evidence, or on the court's recollection.

There is considerable authority for the rule that an amendment or correction of a judgment cannot be made, especially after the term, on extrinsic evidence but must be based on evidence contained in the record, or quasi of record,[51] including the verdict and the pleadings,[52] at least where the error or mistake complained of is such that, if it exists,

Amendment nunc pro tunc

(1) A judgment may be amended nunc pro tunc only on record or quasi-record evidence.—Palatine Ins. Co. v. Hill, 121 So. 412, 219 Ala. 123—Jackson v. Board of Revenue of Choctaw County, 110 So. 799, 215 Ala. 418.

(2) Where formal judgment contained entry taxing costs against contestant, and there was no evidence of any other judgment respecting costs, nunc pro tunc order at subsequent term amending judgment by taking costs against estate was erroneous.—Calnane v. Calnane, 17 S.W.2d 566, 223 Mo.App. 381.

(3) Evidence was held insufficient to justify amendment nunc pro tunc. —Wiggins v. Union Trust Co. of East St. Louis, 266 Ill.App. 560.

Power or authority to allow amendment nunc pro tunc see infra § 258.

Nunc pro tunc entry of judgment see supra § 120.

Nunc pro tunc entry to correct or amend court records generally see Courts § 227 d.

Deficiency in judgment cannot be supplied by parol.—Jackson v. Board of Revenue of Choctaw County, 110 So. 799, 215 Ala. 418.

Presumptions and burden of proof

(1) In proceedings to correct a judgment nunc pro tunc, a presumption exists that judgment entered of record is judgment actually rendered.—In re Tompkin's Estate, Mo.App., 50 S.W.2d 659.

(2) Rule that, where judgment is shown to be rendered for one of the parties, and statute directs what that judgment shall be, it will be presumed that the judgment rendered was only such as could have been rendered, applies in proceedings to correct and amend judgment nunc pro tunc.—Saunders v. Scott, 111 S.W. 874, 132 Mo.App. 209—State v. Juden, Mo.App., 50 S.W.2d 702.

(3) Burden is on party seeking to correct judgment record to overcome presumption of truthfulness of court's recitals of fact in record.—Sullivan v. Coakley, 217 N.W. 820, 205 Iowa 225.

(4) Under statute providing that a judgment shall not be vacated at plaintiff's request until it is adjudged that there is a valid cause of action, where defendants demurred on grounds of misjoinder of causes of action, and that petition did not state a cause of action, and court informed defendants that demurrer would be sustained on ground of misjoinder of parties, and thereafter sustained demurrer generally, and ordered action dismissed, plaintiff, at subsequent term, seeking to correct order sustaining demurrer to correspond to the facts, was not required to show that petition stated cause of action, since trial court, in refusing to sustain demurrers on ground that it failed to state a cause of action, impliedly held that it stated such cause.—Bales v. Brome, 105 P. 2d 568, 56 Wyo. 111.

Recital held insufficient

Where amended judgment recited that, through inadvertence, there was inserted in the record of the judgment a direction and order that a receiver be appointed, such recital cannot justify review by the court of its own judicial act without showing to justify it.—Schroeder v. Superior Court of California in and for Alameda County, 239 P. 65, 73 Cal.App. 687.

Rule not dependent on statute

Necessity of record evidence as condition to amendment of judgment is not dependent on statute.—Palatine Ins. Co. v. Hill, 121 So. 412, 219 Ala. 123.

Uncertainty in judgment may not be supplied by parol proof, since the rule is that judgments may not be amended in any such manner, but the entire record may be inspected to cure the uncertainty.—Decker v Tyree, 264 S.W. 726, 204 Ky. 302.

52. Ga.—Brown v. Cole, 28 S.E.2d 76, 196 Ga. 843—Jones v. Whitehead, 146 S.E. 768, 167 Ga. 848—Miller v. Jackson, 175 S.E. 409, 49 Ga.App. 309.

Mo.—Fulton Loan Service No. 2 v. Colvin, App., 81 S.W.2d 373.

Evidence held sufficient

(1) Contract and pleadings held to authorize court to enter judgment nunc pro tunc, adding name of defendant omitted from original judgment.—Batson v. Bentley, Tex.Civ. App., 4 S.W.2d 577.

(2) Evidence authorized trial judge's finding that recital in judgment denying recovery on pleas of intervention was clerical error, which court could correct at term subsequent to rendition of judgment.—Duncan v. Marlin Motor Co., Tex. Civ.App., 41 S.W.2d 740, error refused.

Findings and pleadings

(1) In deciding a motion to modify the judgment, the court cannot look beyond the findings and pleadings. —Briles v. Prudential Ins. Co., 25 N.E.2d 240, 216 Ind. 627—Brier v. Childers, 148 N.E. 474, 196 Ind. 520—Elliott v. Gardner, 46 N.E.2d 702, 113 Ind.App. 47—Heaton v. Grant Lodge No. 335 I. O. O. F., 103 N. E. 488, 55 Ind.App. 100.

it should be apparent from the papers and records in the case.[53] For the purpose of this rule, the matters relied on need not be part of the record proper, or strict judgment roll; it is generally deemed sufficient if the amendment is not based on parol evidence alone, but is supported by the record, or some note or minute made by the judge or clerk, or notes taken by the stenographer, or some memorial paper or document in the nature of a record made in connection with the case or on the trial or hearing.[54]

Some authorities, however, adhere to the rule, characterized as the more liberal rule,[55] that an amendment may be based on any satisfactory or competent extrinsic evidence,[56] parol as well as written.[57] This rule is subject to the limitation that, where there is no record or quasi-record evidence, the court should act with great caution,[58] and only on evidence which is clear and convincing.[59]

(2) While, on motion to modify judgment, the court cannot look beyond the pleadings to determine theory of the case, this rule refers to the pleadings as construed by the parties.—Montgomery v. Montgomery, 140 N.E. 917, 81 Ind.App. 1.

Affidavit of plaintiff's attorney that defendant's name had been omitted from judgment by mistake, record disclosing such omission was held sufficient for amendment.—Citizens' Nat. Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles v. Holton, 290 P. 447, 210 Cal. 44.

Appearance or judgment docket entries

(1) Appearance and docket entries of amount of judgment were held admissible in proceeding to correct judgment.—Brooks v. Owen, 202 N. W. 505, 200 Iowa 1151, modified on other grounds and rehearing denied 206 N.W. 149.

(2) Where action and cross action were identified on court's docket by same number and style, court's docket entry stating that such numbered and styled case was "dismissed for want of prosecution" sufficiently evidenced the fact that the court rendered judgment dismissing the whole case so that, if judgment as entered was not sufficient to effect a dismissal of the cross action, it was a sufficient notation to support a nunc pro tunc order to correct the judgment so as to make it include the cross action in dismissal.—Johnson v. Campbell, Tex.Civ.App., 154 S.W.2d 878.

Evidence outside of the judgment sought to be amended may be admitted.—Willard v. Loucks, 175 N.E. 256, 97 Ind.App. 131.

Memoranda of judge

Absence of witness at opening of probate court when certain person was adjudged incompetent and guardian was appointed, and absence of sheriff and clerk from hearing were insufficient to overturn recitals of judgment.—Randolph v. Porter, 67 S.W.2d 574, 188 Ark. 729.

Overcoming recitals

In order to justify nunc pro tunc judgment after term, evidence, supplemented by judge's personal recollection, must be so clear as to overcome recitals of written judgment sought to be corrected.—Morgan v. Scott-Mayer Commission Co., 48 S.W. 2d 838, 185 Ark. 637.

Parol evidence was sufficient where the judge who rendered the original judgments was the same judge who made the correction therein as to

Parol and extrinsic evidence may be competent for various purposes in connection with record evidence,[60] as to show whether the record shows what was really done,[61] or to support or rebut evidence not technically a matter of record.[62]

Although there is authority to the contrary,[63] it has been held that an amendment at a subsequent term cannot be based on the judge's knowledge or recollection of the facts,[64] and that such an amendment cannot rest on the recollection of other persons.[65]

After the lapse of a long period, such as fifty years, clear, cogent, and convincing proof should be required for amendment,[66] nothing being left to speculation or conjecture.[67]

During the term, and before the court has lost jurisdiction of the cause, it has been held that an amendment of the judgment may be made on any evidence satisfactory to the court, whether oral or documentary, and whether of record or otherwise,[68] or the court may act solely on its own knowledge and recollection.[69]

§ 257. —— Hearing and Determination in General

On an application to amend a judgment, the adverse party is entitled to a hearing. Only matters involved in determining the necessity or propriety of the amendment will be examined.

On an application to amend a judgment, the adverse party is entitled to be heard in opposition.[70] The questions presented, whether of law or fact, are for the determination of the court to which the motion is addressed.[71] No questions will be examined other than those necessary to determine the necessity or propriety of the amendment.[72] Matters already determined will not be reviewed and 72. Ga.—Pryor v. Leonard, 57 Ga. 136.

Nature of questions raised
(1) Motion to modify judgment merely raises the question whether judgment follows the conclusions of re-examined; the motion is not a new trial or rehearing of the original case.[73]

The opening of the judgment for the purpose of amending it should not be made the occasion for granting relief other than that asked in the motion,[74] although it is proper to impose reasonable and just conditions on granting the amendment, as discussed infra § 260. A judgment may be amended as to one only of several joint parties where the rights of the others will not be affected.[75]

Where an alteration of the record would be futile, an application therefor will not be granted.[76] An equitable estoppel is ground for denial of the application.[77] Where the motion is too broad, it may be denied in toto.[78]

An inquiry into facts dehors the record may be had by reference or otherwise.[79]

§ 258. —— Allowing Amendment Nunc pro Tunc

Subject to the rules governing amendments and corrections of judgments generally, a court may amend or correct its own judgments nunc pro tunc, for clerical errors or omissions, so as to make them speak the truth, but not to correct judicial errors or omissions, or to change a judgment.

Subject to the rules governing amendments and corrections of judgments generally, discussed supra § 228 et seq, the power to amend or correct a judgment nunc pro tunc so as to make it speak the truth is inherent in courts of record.[80] Thus, if a judgment has been irregularly entered, or fails to contain all that is essential to it, or to express the true decision of the court, in consequence of clerical errors or omissions, it may be completed by an order nunc pro tunc, or may be set aside and the true and correct judgment entered nunc pro tunc.[81] law.—Kostanzer v. State ex rel. Ramsey, 187 N.E. 337, 205 Ind. 536.

(2) A motion to modify a judgment does not present any question as to what finding ought to be, but only whether judgment conforms to findings actually made.—Briles v. Prudential Ins. Co., 25 N.E.2d 240, 216 Ind. 627—Brier v. Childers, 148 N.E. 474, 196 Ind. 520—Elliott v. Gardner, 46 N.E.2d 702, 113 Ind.App. 47.

(3) A judge who has made a decision should not direct amendment, unless he is satisfied that original entry does not clearly express order which was made.—Kohlstedt v. Hauseur, 74 P.2d 314, 24 Cal.App.2d 60.

What constitutes clerical error generally see supra § 237.

The test of whether a judgment may be amended nunc pro tunc is whether the change will make the record speak the truth as to what was actually determined or done or intended to be determined or done by the court, or whether it will alter such action or intended action.—State ex rel. Kruletz v. District Court of Fifth Judicial Dist. in and for Beaverhead County, 98 P.2d 883, 110 Mont. 36.

Purpose

(1) The purpose of a nunc pro tunc order correcting a clerical error in a judgment appearing on the face of the record is to make the judgment as entered conform to the judicial decision actually made.—Barkelew v. Barkelew, Cal.App., 166 P.2d 57.

(2) The purpose of a nunc pro tunc judgment is to record a judgment theretofore pronounced by the court but which has been imperfectly or erroneously entered.—Goodman v. Mayer, 128 S.W.2d 1156, 133 Tex. 319.

(3) The purpose of a nunc pro tunc order is to have judgment reflect its true finding, and, whenever original judgment entry does not do so, trial court has very broad power to correct the entry by nunc pro tunc order.—Tresemer v. Gugle, 42 N.E.2d 712, 70 Ohio App. 409.

(4) The sole purpose for which a judgment may be amended nunc pro tunc is to correct an error which has crept into the judgment by reason of misprision on part of the clerk, judge, or counsel, when the error is apparent on face of the records, so that the judgment will truly express what was actually decided or intended to be decided and will grant the relief originally intended to be granted together with the relief following therefrom by reason of law.—State ex rel. Kruletz v. District Court of Fifth Judicial Dist. in and for Beaverhead County, 98 P.2d 883, 110 Mont. 36.

Judgment in excess of statutory limit was not a clerical error which could be corrected by a nunc pro tunc order.—Garrison v. Williams, 17 P.2d 1072, 128 Cal.App. 598.

Lapse of long period

A judgment may be amended at a subsequent term, nunc pro tunc, even a long time after rendition, and thus perfect verdict, where rights of intermediate parties will not be prejudiced.—Tanner v. Wilson, 192 S.E. 425, 184 Ga. 628.

rendered, even though the judgment actually rendered was not the judgment the judge intended to render.[87] It cannot be used to enlarge the judgment as originally rendered[88] or to change the rights fixed by it as it was originally intended or made,[89] nor can it be employed where the fault in the original judgment is that it is wrong as a matter of law[90] or to allow the court to review and reverse its action with respect to what it formerly refused to do or assent to.[91]

Where the clerk has made no entry of the judgment, a motion to amend by entering judgment nunc pro tunc cannot be granted because there is no judgment to amend.[92]

§ 259. —— Discretion of Court

Whether or not a court will amend, modify, or correct a judgment generally rests within its sound discretion.

Although in some circumstances the allowance of an amendment or correction of a judgment is a matter of duty,[93] an application to amend, modify, or correct a judgment is generally addressed to the sound discretion of the court,[94] and, as stated in Appeal & Error § 1630, the exercise of such discretion will not be interfered with by an appellate court unless an abuse of discretion is manifest, nor, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Mandamus § 97, also 38 C.J. p 636 notes 71–78, will it usually be controlled by mandamus. This discretion, however, must not be exercised in an arbitrary manner,[95] and the court will not favorably exercise its discretion and allow an amendment where injustice will thereby be done to anyone.[96] Relief is granted on equitable principles and only on a showing of merits in the application.[97]

After the term, the power of amendment should be exercised discretely and with caution.[98]

§ 260. —— Imposition of Terms

In granting an application to amend a judgment, the court may impose reasonable and just terms.

In the exercise of its discretion to grant or refuse an application to amend a judgment, the court, in granting such application, may impose such terms as are reasonable and just.[99]

§ 261. —— Order

An order granting or refusing an amendment to a judgment is a final order. Where it allows such amendment, it should recite all necessary jurisdictional facts and should not be too broad.

The order granting or overruling a motion to amend a judgment is a final order which cannot be set aside at a subsequent term,[1] and which precludes a renewal of the motion[2] or a retrial of the question in a subsequent action.[3]

An order allowing an amendment of a judgment should recite all necessary jurisdictional facts.[4] It should not be too broad;[5] only as much of the judgment as needs correction should be corrected.[6]

§ 262. —— Mode of Making Amendments

Although good practice requires that the amendment of a judgment be actually made as directed, other methods are permitted or tolerated, such as the entry of the order for amendment, or erasure and interlineation.

Although good practice requires not only that the amendment of a judgment should be ordered, but that the clerk should actually make it as directed,[7] such amendment may practically be accomplished by entering the order therefor, or the making and entry of an order which effects the same result,[8] in which case the amendment may actually be made at any time thereafter,[9] or by the entry of a release or remittitur, where that will make the necessary correction.[10] The courts tolerate, but do not favor, the making of such corrections by erasure and interlineation on the original record,[11] the better method being to annul or vacate the defective entry and replace it by a new entry,[12] which, as stated supra § 258, in proper cases may be ordered to be made nunc pro tunc. There must be a compliance with a statute requiring amendment in open court.[13] The judgment of a court cannot be changed or modified by the agreement of parties or the testimony of witnesses.[14]

Where a judgment already made in a cause is tacitly revoked during the same term, and a second judgment is made on the same subject matter, it is more orderly and convenient, in making the second judgment, to refer to the first one and state in what particular it is intended to modify, supplement, or supersede it; but this is not essential where a comparison of the two judgments discloses the changes or modifications made.[15] An order authorizing execution on a judgment does not constitute an amendment of the judgment.[16] The filing of amended findings and the entry of a modified judgment, without first vacating the judgment previously entered, has been held proper.[17]

§ 263. —— Operation and Effect in General

Generally an amendment or correction of a judgment makes the judgment of the same effect as though the defects necessitating the amendment had never existed; it does not confer any new or additional rights.

Since the amendment of a judgment is merely perfected evidence of what, in contemplation of law, existed from the time judgment was pronounced,[18] as between the parties the amendment or correction of a judgment relates back to the original judgment and becomes a part of it, and makes the judgment of the same effect as though the defects or mistakes because of which it was amended or corrected had never existed.[19] However, it usually does not make a new judgment or confer any new or additional rights,[20] although a change materially affecting a judgment and the rights of the parties against whom it is rendered and involving the exercise of judicial discretion does amount to a new judgment.[21]

Generally an amendment leaves the original judgment effective and unimpaired;[22] and where the court strikes out part of a judgment the remaining portion stands[23] so that the court need not enter a new judgment with the stricken part omitted.[24]

An order amending a clerical error in a judgment does not supersede the judgment or incorporate it into the order,[25] and the act of the clerk in correcting the judgment pursuant to such order is ministerial and does not affect the materiality or finality of the judgment or order.[26]

Where a party applies for and obtains an amendment of the judgment, he thereby waives all erroneous rulings of the court preceding the judgment.[27] An amendment or correction of a judgment is binding on those parties who were afforded an opportunity to be heard;[28] but an amendment or modification changing the rights of the parties as fixed by a former judgment is not binding on a party in interest who was not afforded such opportunity.[29]

§ 264. —— Rights of Third Persons

An amendment of a judgment, unless made at the same term at which the judgment was rendered, will not be allowed to prejudice the rights of third persons who have acquired interests for value and without notice.

While a few cases hold that it is the duty of the court to amend and correct its records so as to make them speak the truth regardless of the effect of so doing on the interests of either parties or third persons,[30] the general rule is that an amendment of a judgment will not be allowed to prejudice the rights of third persons who have acquired interests for value,[31] except where they have taken with notice[32] or where the amendment is made at the same term at which the judgment is rendered.[33] The order allowing an amendment should contain a saving of the intervening rights of third persons[34] but the law makes such reservation whether or not it is expressly reserved.[35]

C. OPENING AND VACATING

1. In General

§ 265. In General

Courts of record or of general jurisdiction have inherent power to vacate or set aside their own judgments.

In accordance with the rules governing the power and control of a court over its judgments generally, considered supra §§ 228–235, the authority to vacate or set aside its own judgments is inherently incident to all courts of record or of general jurisdiction,[36] and may be exercised without the grant of any special statutory authority,[37] although courts of special or limited jurisdiction have no such powers in the absence of statutes expressly granting them.[38] However, in jurisdictions having statutes regulating the power, the statutes are controlling.[39] The rules governing the vacation of decrees in equity and of judgments at law are the same.[40]

Opening and vacating distinguished. Opening a judgment is not setting it aside, striking it, annulling, or reversing it, but is a mode of allowing defendant a hearing on the merits, the judgment meanwhile remaining in force and standing as security; if the defense is successful the judgment is vacated, otherwise when it is closed by the action of the court it operates as though it had never been disturbed.[41] Another distinction is that a petition to vacate or set aside or strike a judgment is based on fatal defects apparent on the face of the record, while petitions to open concern other matters associated with the judgment, or those on which the judgment is based, in other words, the merits of the controversy.[42] An application to open a judgment admits its validity.[43]

Judgments against personal representative. The rule stated above has been held to apply to judgments against a personal representative, and such judgments may be opened or vacated when proper grounds for such relief exist.[44]

Judgments in ejectment. Within and under the general rules, a judgment in ejectment may be set aside for a sufficient cause,[45] whether the judgment is against the casual ejector[46] or against the tenant.[47]

Motion for new trial distinguished. The motion to vacate is to be distinguished from a motion for a new trial which is granted on different principles and grounds;[48] and statutes regulating or limiting motions for a new trial have no application to motions to open or vacate the judgment.[49]

"Impeach." The word "impeach," as applied to

§ 266. Right to and Grounds for Relief

The grounds on which courts may open or vacate their judgments, particularly after the term, are generally matters which render the judgment void or which are specified in statutes authorizing such action.

In accordance with the rules governing the power and control of courts over their judgments generally, considered supra §§ 228–235, it has been held, without reference to the term or time at which the judgment was rendered, that the inherent power of a court to open or vacate its judgment may be exercised when the judgment is void,[52] or when there has been a procedural or jurisdictional defect or where a question of fraud or other collateral issue is raised,[53] and that courts have no power to set aside judgments on other grounds unless specific power is granted to them.[54] However, under some statutes the courts may open or vacate their judgments on various other grounds;[55] but the statute will not prevent the courts from acting on other grounds or causes which would be good and sufficient at common law, and an application based on such a ground is not governed by the statute.[56] In general a judgment or decree once solemnly entered should not be easily or lightly opened or vacated except for cogent reasons.[57] A judgment can be set aside for various reasons even though it is not reversible.[58]

Time. During the term the power of the court is absolute, and the court may even change its decision on the merits; accordingly any consideration sufficient to move the equitable discretion of the court is ground for opening or vacating the judgment during the term.[59] While the statutory grounds have been held merely cumulative,[60] it has been held that after the term the judgment can be opened only on statutory grounds,[61] except where

§ 267. —— Invalidity of Judgment in General

Invalidity of the judgment of such nature as to render it void is a valid ground for vacating it, at least if the invalidity is apparent on the face of the record.

Under or apart from statutory provisions, invalidity of the judgment as for want of jurisdiction either of the person or of the subject matter, or of the question determined and to give the particular relief granted, rendering the judgment void, as distinguished from merely voidable or erroneous, is ground for vacating it,[63] even after the expiration

Existence of valid or meritorious defense to action as condition of relief see infra § 290.

The reason for enacting statute authorizing courts to set aside void judgments or orders was the probability that the legislature feared that courts not of record might be held not to possess such power after repeal of statutes authorizing justice courts to set aside void judgments and to relieve against judgments on ground of inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect.—F. E. Young Co. v. Fernstrom, 79 P.2d 1117, 31 Cal. App.2d Supp. 763.

Judgment beyond issues

(1) A judgment outside the issues in the case and on a matter not submitted to the court for its determination is a nullity, and may be vacated at any time on motion of the judgment debtor or other persen affected thereby.

Kan.—Hawkins v. Smith, 111 P.2d 1108, 153 Kan. 542.

Okl.—Electrical Research Products v. Haniotis Bros., 39 P.2d 42, 170 Okl. 150.

(2) In action to declare a resulting trust of real property in favor of plaintiffs where judgment for plaintiffs undertook to adjudicate rights to described personal property, plaintiffs' statement that no personalty was demanded was a concession of error subject to attack by defendant's motion after judgment term to set the judgment aside on ground of irregularity.—Weatherford v. Spiritual Christian Union Church, Mo., 163 S.W.2d 916.

Judgment for less than jurisdictional amount

Under statute providing for dismissal of cause where amount sued for is less than jurisdiction of court, and for taxation of entire cost against plaintiff where suit is brought for amount of which court has jurisdiction and a smaller sum is recovered, the overruling of defendants' motion to set aside judgment for plaintiff for one cent and costs on ground that judgment was for an amount less than jurisdiction of court was not error.—Watson v. Spinks, 199 So. 1, 240 Ala. 291.

Question of venue

(1) Whether trial should be in county court from which summons issued or in county in which served was question, not of jurisdiction, but of venue, which should be raised by motion for removal to latter county, not by motion to set aside judgment.—Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Turner, 130 S.E. 154, 190 N.C. 471.

(2) Where an action to recover damages to land caused by drainage water from defendants' adjoining land was brought in county where plaintiff's land was situated, against defendants residing in other counties and in which counties each was served with summons, a motion filed after term to vacate judgment was improperly overruled, even though a defense to the action was not tendered, since action, being "transitory," was maintainable only in county in which one of the defendants resided or service could be had and judgment was "void" ab initio.—Snyder v. Clough, 50 N.E.2d 384, 71 Ohio App. 440.

Judgment based on void judgment

On motion to set aside judgment based on filing transcript of another judgment, it is proper to grant relief asked on showing that the other judgment was void.—Lowry v. Himmler, 239 N.Y.S. 347, 136 Misc. 215.

Judgment based on void verdict

In joint action for injuries sustained in automobile collision against owner of automobile and her son who was driving automobile at time of collision, a verdict exonerating son but finding owner liable was void and the judgment based thereon could be attacked on a motion to set aside.—Kalil v. Spivey, 27 S.E.2d 475, 70 Ga.App. 34.

Facts held not to show want of jurisdiction

Where surviving partners suing the alien property custodian and the United States treasurer to recover a debt claimed to be owing to firm by an enemy corporation set forth in their complaint their claim, their nonenemy status, transactions out of which claim arose, and that they had given statutory notice of claim, denials of answer concerning partners' status and transactions, and affirmative defenses alleging that there were prior claims, that partners did not have title to cause of action, that partnership had been dissolved through outbreak of war, that claim had passed to another partner and on his death to his German executors who had entered into an arbitration agreement, and that arbitrators had found no liability on part of enemy corporation, presented issues which the district court was competent to try, and hence unappealed from judgment on such issues could not be set aside for want of jurisdiction on ground that beneficial owner of claim was an enemy as defined by the act.—Jackson v. Irving Trust Co., 61 S. Ct. 326, 311 U.S. 494, 85 L.Ed. 297.

Facts held not to warrant relief

(1) Conduct of condemnation proceeding by special assistant to attorney general is not ground for vacation of final condemnation order and judgment.—U. S. v. Certain Land at Great Neck in Nassau County, N.Y., D.C.N.Y., 57 F.Supp. 157.

(2) A definitive judgment, in petitory action by plaintiffs who had possession of land under recorded tax deed, could not be set aside for alleged invalidity of tax sale because taxes for collection of which sale was made had been made on part of property by third person.—Adkins' Heirs v. Crawford, Jenkins & Booth, La., 24 So.2d 246.

(3) Where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter, a judgment cannot be vacated on the ground that there was no case or controversy before the court, since that question should properly be raised by appeal or bill of review.—Swift & Co. v. U. S., App.D.C., 48 S.Ct. 311, 276 U.S. 311, 72 L.Ed. 587.

to annul an invalid judgment.[65] However, it has also been held that a void judgment need not be set aside since it is an absolute nullity and ineffective without being set aside.[66] Any applicable statutes are, of course, controlling.[67]

Process, service, or notice lacking or defective. Since the validity and regularity of a judgment depend on the existence and sufficiency of the process or notice on which it is based, as discussed supra §§ 23–25, it is good ground for vacating or opening a judgment that defendant had no notice of the action, either because of a failure to serve him with process or because the process or service was fatally irregular or defective.[68] Thus a false return

Determination from record

(1) Whether the judgment is void on its face must be determined from an inspection of the judgment roll alone, and unless the record affirmatively shows that the court was without jurisdiction, the judgment is not subject to such summary action.—Spahn v. Spahn, Cal.App., 162 P.2d 53.

(2) A judgment is void on its face when the judgment roll affirmatively shows that trial court lacks either jurisdiction over the person, jurisdiction over the subject matter, or judicial power to render the particular judgment.—Town of Watonga v. Crane Co., 114 P.2d 941, 189 Okl. 184—Caraway v. Overholser, 77 P. 2d 688, 182 Okl. 357.

(4) A judgment would not be vacated where it would be presumed that facts required to be proved to confer jurisdiction were duly proved, even though record was silent on the matter.—Town of Watonga v. Crane Co., 114 P.2d 941, 189 Okl. 184.

Service by publication

(1) Where service of summons by publication on defendants was based on an affidavit which was defective because of failure to allege that defendants could not after due diligence be found in the state, the denying of motion of defendants to vacate the judgment because of defective service was error.—Groce v. Groce, 199 S.E. 388, 214 N.C. 398.

(2) However where court appointed guardian ad litem for certain defendants who were cited by publication in suit on notes and to foreclose vendor's and trust deed liens, and judgment made specific provision protecting interests of defendants so summoned, judgment would not be set aside on ground that by exercise of reasonable diligence defendants' residences could have been ascertained; moreover without showing that defendants' residence could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or that he had meritorious of service of process has been held ground for vacating the judgment.[69] However, in some cases it has been held that the failure or defect must be apparent on the face of the record,[70] so that a judgment will not be vacated on the claim of a false return of service, since the return is conclusive,[71] unless there is an irreconcilable conflict in the judgment roll.[72]

In any event, a judgment will not be set aside for mere clerical errors, omissions, or irregularities in the process not affecting the jurisdiction,[73] especially where defendant had actual notice of the commencement of the action[74] and refrained from appearing and defending in the expectation that he could overturn the judgment in consequence of such error or defect,[75] or where his objections to the process or service are waived by his appearance.[76] Moreover, when a party has once been properly served with proper process, he is in court for every purpose connected with the action, and cannot have the judgment vacated for the failure to notify him of some intermediate step in the case.[77]

Unauthorized appearance. Where a judgment is entered without service of process on the judgment defendant, based solely on an unauthorized appearance of an attorney, some cases have held that the remedy of the judgment defendant is against the attorney, and that the judgment cannot be opened or vacated on the ground that such appearance was unauthorized unless the attorney is insolvent and not able to respond in damages for his wrong,[78] or unless plaintiff or his attorney was guilty of fraud or collusion, or was otherwise a party to the wrong,[79] or where there is some other good reason for not confining the party to his remedy against the attorney, in which cases the judgment may be opened or vacated.[80] However, the generally prevailing rule is that a judgment entered without the service of process on the unauthorized appearance of an attorney may be set aside without regard to whether or not the attorney is financially responsible for his wrong,[81] provided defendant did not accept or ratify the unauthorized act of the attorney, as by acquiescing in it or failing to object, with full knowledge.[82]

Where process has been served, and plaintiff is innocent of any fraud or collusion, and the attorney is solvent, the party for whom the attorney appeared is confined to his remedy against the latter, plaintiff in such case being regarded as blameless and defendant negligent in not appearing and making defense by his own attorney, if he had any defense.[83]

§ 268. —— Irregularity of Judgment in General

A material and substantial irregularity which has not been cured or waived is a ground for opening or vacating judgment if the complaining party is adversely affected thereby.

A judgment ordinarily will not be vacated for merely technical, formal, and unimportant irregularities which may be disregarded on the principle of harmless error,[84] or which are curable by amendment,[85] or which may be deemed cured or waived as by failure to object in due season;[86] and the only remedy for such irregularity is by proceedings for review by an appellate court.[87] However, irregularity in the proceedings leading to the entry of a judgment, as distinguished from mere error which is considered infra § 274, has been held a ground for vacating the judgment,[88] provided it is preju-

Particular irregularities held insufficient

Wash.—Larson v. Department of Labor and Industries, 25 P.2d 1040, 174 Wash. 618.

(2) Fact that court in rendering final judgment inadvertently overlooked previous minute entry setting case for hearing at subsequent date was held not to justify nunc pro tunc order at subsequent term annulling final judgment.—State ex rel. Holtkamp v. Hartmann, 51 S.W.2d 22, 330 Mo. 386.

(3) Failure of commissioners, appraising land condemned, to include description thereof, date of view, and other details, was not irregularity authorizing vacation of final judgment awarding owner amount of damages assessed by them.—Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Wasson, 24 P.2d 1098, 37 N.M. 503, followed in Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Gardner, 24 P.2d 1104, 37 N.M. 514.

(4) On bill to review judgment rendered on notice by publication, where the issues were made and tried on the bill and answers filed thereto, the judgment will not be set aside merely because there was technical failure to set aside the original judgment and make up the same issues on the old petition and answers.—Witcher v. Hanley, 253 S.W. 1002, 299 Mo. 696.

(5) A valid judgment is not rendered void merely by an unauthorized, immaterial, and nonprejudicial interlineation, and addition to judgment by attorney for plaintiff after judge had signed judgment and immediately over judge's signature did not change nature, force or effect of judgment, and hence such interpolation did not invalidate otherwise valid judgment as constituting a fraud upon defendants' rights.—Parrish v. Ferriell, 186 S.W.2d 625, 299 Ky. 676.

(6) Judgment creditor's laches in not having judgment entered of record until more than six years after rendition thereof, where there was no showing that judgment debtor had been harmed in any way by belated filing, since belated entry of judgment did not extend lien thereof.—Harvey v. Gibson, 2 S.E.2d 385, 190 S.C. 98.

Statute as to automatic amendment

Where record was insufficient to sustain decree in failing to require county in whom title to realty was adjudged to pay county's bid on tax sales to sheriff and in failing to show payment thereof, and deficiency could have been supplied by amendment, plaintiff was not entitled to have decree set aside, in view of statute providing that an amendable decree under such circumstances is, in legal effect, amended.—Burch v. Fraud or collusion in obtaining judgment is a sufficient ground for opening or vacating it, even after the term at which it was rendered, provided the fraud was extrinsic and collateral to the matter tried and not a matter actually or potentially in issue in the action.

The fact that a judgment was obtained through fraud or collusion is universally held to constitute a sufficient reason for opening or vacating such judgment either during or after the term at which it was rendered.[96] In some jurisdictions statutes confer power on the courts to vacate judgments on the ground of fraud and to regulate its exercise,[97] although generally courts of record possess

Facts held not to constitute fraud
Where case on oral agreement is continued to permit defendant's counsel to take depositions, action of plaintiff's counsel in taking judgment at subsequent term, in absence of defendant's counsel, is not fraud, or ground for setting judgment aside.—National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Ethridge, 124 S.E. 546, 32 Ga.App. 725.

Fraud of party attacking judgment
A declaratory judgment establishing that plaintiff had never been validly married to defendant would not be vacated on plaintiff's motion on ground that plaintiff had facilitated granting of judgment, in that she had accepted a settlement and thereafter acquiesced in the result without trial justice's knowledge.—Greenman v. Greenman, 53 N.Y.S.2d 551, affirmed 59 N.Y.S.2d 153, 269 App.Div. 988.

Party attacking judgment not deceived

A judgment procured through the fraud or collusion of an executor or administrator will not be allowed to stand against the objection of a party in interest.—Patterson v. Carter, 41 So. 133, 147 Ala. 522—24 C.J. p 888 note 81.

"Fraud practiced in obtaining judgment"
Where defendant was allegedly inan inherent common-law power in this behalf, which is not dependent on legislation.[98] However, inferior courts not of record do not possess this power,[99] unless it is conferred by statute.[1]

Nature of fraud required. While a few cases have held or assumed for the purpose of the decision that a judgment should be vacated for fraud or deceit practiced by one party on the other in regard to the cause of action,[2] the authority to set aside judgments for fraud after the term usually is limited to cases where the fraud complained of was practiced in the very act of obtaining the judgment, and all cases of fraud which might have been used as a defense to defeat the action are excluded; the fraud must be extrinsic and collateral to the matter tried, and not a matter which was actually or potentially in issue in the action,[3] unless the interpoduced to sign note by misrepresentation and misrepresentation was allegedly repeated shortly before suit, such fraud, if inducing defendant to believe that he had no defense, was "fraud practiced in obtaining judgment" within statute permitting vacation of judgment and granting new trial after term.—Rock Island Plow Co. v. Brunkan, 248 N.W. 32, 215 Iowa 1264.

Fraud of "successful party"

A creditor who, in order to establish his claim, intervened in action for dissolution of partnership, could thereby become a "successful party" as to judgment approving receiver's sale of personal property, within statute authorizing district court to vacate its judgment, after the term, for fraud practiced by the "successful party."—Mayer v. What constitutes "extrinsic or collateral fraud"

(1) "Fraud, which is extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the court," within the rule, is fraud, the effect of which is to prevent the unsuccessful party from having a trial or from presenting his case fully, as keeping him away from court, or purposely keeping him in ignorance of the action, or where an attorney fraudulently pretends to represent a

sition of such defense was prevented by fraud, accident, or the act of the opposite party without fault or blame on his own part.[4] The principle that a final judgment concludes all matters litigated, or which might have been litigated in the case, affords the fundamental reason for this rule[5] which applies equally whether the judgment is attacked by motion in the cause or by separate suit.[6] The instances in which the judgment may be vacated are those in which the party is prevented from having a fair trial of the real issue by reason of the fraudulent contrivance of his adversary.[7]

Fraud practiced on the court is always ground for vacating the judgment, as where the court is deceived or misled as to material circumstances, or its process is abused, resulting in the rendition of a judgment which would not have been given if the whole conduct of the case had been fair.[8] So a party and connives at his defeat, or, being regularly employed, sells out his client's interest, or where a party, residing without the jurisdiction of the court, is induced by false pretenses or representations to come within the jurisdiction for the sole purpose of getting personal service of process on him, or where, through the instrumentality of the successful party, the witnesses of his adversary are forcibly or illegally detained from court or bribed to disobey the subpœna served on them, or where a judgment is obtained in violation of an agreement between the parties.

Hearsay evidence

Proof that only evidence given by plaintiff, in quiet title action against county, was hearsay evidence, would not establish that decree in favor of plaintiff was fraudulently entered, so as to provide ground for vacating the decree.—Harter v. King County, 119 P.2d 919, 11 Wash.2d 583.

False allegations in pleadings are not such fraud as will justify or require vacation of the judgment.—Steele v. The Maccabees, 53 P.2d 232, 175 Okl. 471—34 C.J. p 280 note 96 [c].

Defendant's fraud as to garnishee

Where insurer under automobile liability policy was summoned as garnishee in attachment execution on a judgment obtained in action by injured party against insured, in which insurer was not a party, petition to open judgment on ground of collusion and fraud imposed on garnishee by insured and injured party was properly denied, since such defenses could be interposed in the attachment proceeding; and the procedure formerly adhered to of permitting a party to open judgment to interpose a defense of fraud or collusion to defraud garnishee should not be resorted to unless there is some compelling reason therefor and the third party should be compelled to litigate his right in a collateral issue.—Renschler v. Pizano, 198 A. 33, 329 Pa. 249.

Concealment of material facts

(1) The concealment of facts which, if revealed to a trial court, may result in a postponement of an adjudication until absent party can be heard, constitutes "extrinsic fraud" which will warrant setting aside of the judgment.—Landon v. Landon, Cal.App., 159 P.2d 980.

(2) An order of partition procured by a party who concealed such material facts as would have defeated the action is properly vacated on the application of the real parties in interest.—Daleschal v. Geiser, 13 P. 595, 36 Kan. 374.

(3) Judgment obtained against corporation by default in action wherein four of five directors had adverse interest constituted "extrinsic fraud or collusion," warranting vacation of judgment at instance of stockholder, where directors' interest had not been disclosed.—Kerr v. Southwest Fluorite Co., 294 P. 324, 35 N.M. 232.

Fraud in service of process

(1) A judgment obtained against one induced by fraud to come within the jurisdiction where he is served with process may be set aside as fraudulent.—Wyman v. Newhouse, C. C.A.N.Y., 93 F.2d 313, 115 A.L.R. 460, judgment may be vacated for misrepresentations or tricks practiced on defendant to keep him away from the trial, or to prevent him from claiming his rights in the premises, or from setting up an available defense,[9] or for fraudulent collusion between some of the parties to the action, or between the counsel in the case, working injury to the just rights of the others.[10] However, mere failure to disclose to the adversary, or to the court, matters which would defeat one's own claim or defense is not such extrinsic fraud as will justify or require vacation of the judgment.[11]

While there is some authority to the contrary,[12] actual fraud as distinguished from constructive fraud has been held essential,[13] except in the case of judgments against municipalities.[14]

§ 270. —— Perjury

In general perjury at the trial is not regarded as a ground for vacating the judgment.

Perjury at the trial generally is held to be no ground for vacating the judgment[15] as being one certiorari denied 58 S.Ct. 831, 303 U.S. 664, 82 L.Ed. 1122.

(2) A willful misstatement of defendant's address in an affidavit for publication of summons is "extrinsic fraud" which justifies setting aside judgment resulting from proceedings of which defendant did not have notice.—Rivieccio v. Bothan, Cal., 165 P.2d 677.

Bribery

Where suits by fire insurance companies to enjoin superintendent of insurance from interfering with collection of proposed increased rates were settled by bribery of the superintendent, the bribery constituted extrinsic fraud which would permit reopening of decrees of dismissal after term for purpose of ordering redistribution of amount of rate increase which had been impounded and collected pending the litigation. —American Ins. Co. v. Lucas, D.C. Mo., 38 F.Supp. 926, appeals dismissed 62 S.Ct. 107, 314 U.S. 575, 86 L.Ed. 466, and affirmed, C.C.A., American Ins. Co. v. No injury resulting Collusion between third persons and municipal employees or official not shown to have resulted in injury to the municipality is not cause for setting aside a judgment regularly obtained.—City of New York v. Brady, 22 N.E. 237, 115 N.Y. 599.

Nondisclosure of agreement with co-defendant

In action against several defendants jointly to recover for an injury, plaintiff was under no duty to inform one defendant of agreement with co-defendants under which plaintiff received sum of money in satisfaction of her claim against them, and plaintiff's nondisclosure thereof was not "fraudulent" so as to require vacation of judgment against such defendant for fraud.—Gillespie v. Brewer, Miss., 10 So.2d 197.

12. Inadvertent withholding of facts

The right of a court to vacate or modify judgment is not limited to showing that it was procured by actual fraud, collusion, and misrepresentation, but it is sufficient if there is a showing that the rights of interested parties are prejudicially affected by the judgment and if there was inadvertently a withholding from the court of matters which should have been properly before it, but for which withholding the judgment would not have been rendered. —Pengelly v. 14. Constructive or legal fraud as sufficient

Where illegal claim against municipal or quasi-municipal corporation is reduced to judgment under agreement between claimant and officers representing municipality without judicial determination of merits of claim and where circumstances surrounding entry of judgment justify finding of collusion, court may vacate judgment on grounds of legal fraud; and where, after taxpayer had established, in test cases, right to recover protested tax because not properly notified of increase in property valuation, attorneys of claimants in consolidated case and county official prepared journal entry reciting rendition of judgment in consolidated case as of date of trial of test cases and obtained judge's signature without consulting city and school district, not parties to case but interested in funds involved and whose attorneys had indicated disposition to participate in trial, facts established that judgment in consolidated case should be vacated because based on legal fraud.—Abernathy v. Huston, supra.

obtained by fraud,[16] within the rule stated supra § 269, unless specially made so by statute,[17] or unless the perjury is connected with extrinsic or collateral fraud and the complaining party is without fault.[18] This rule rests on grounds of public policy which requires that there shall be an end to litigation.[19] Some courts hold, however, that a judgment may be vacated for perjury under certain conditions,[20] as where a party obtains a judgment by his own willful perjury, or by the use of false testimony, which he knows at the time to be false.[21] In any event perjury is not ground for vacating the judgment where the judgment does not rest on the perjured testimony, as where it relates to an immaterial matter,[22] or where it does not appear that the perjury was in any way instrumental in the court's assuming jurisdiction of the case.[23]

§ 271. —— Violation of Agreement

A judgment secured in violation of an agreement not to enter judgment may be vacated on that ground.

Where there was an agreement between the parties that the case should be continued, or that defendant's time to answer should be extended, or that the action should be dismissed as the result of a compromise or settlement, or a promise of plaintiff that he would not press the case to judgment, in violation of which plaintiff, without notice to defendant, secures a judgment against the latter in his absence, it is good ground for vacating the judg-

Only when a judgment is clearly shown to have been obtained by fraud or false testimony and when it would be against good conscience to enforce judgment and proper showing of due diligence is made will a judgment be vacated after term in which it was rendered.—Lincoln County v. Provident Loan & Inv. Co. of Lincoln, Neb., 22 N.W.2d 609—Kielian v. Kent & Burke Co., 268 N.W. 79, 131 Neb. 308.

Complaining party without fault

An action will lie to set aside a judgment procured by the false and perjured testimony of the party in whose favor the judgment was rendered, where the party against whom such judgment was rendered was not personally served, was not wanting in diligence in presenting his defenses in the original action, was prevented from so doing by the wrongful conduct of the adverse party, and moved with due diligence to set aside the judgment after its rendition.—Lunt v. Lunt, Tex.Civ.App., 121 S.W.2d 445, error dismissed.

ment.[24] However, the agreement or promise must have been explicit, and of such a character that defendant could rely on it and remain inactive without being thereby chargeable with negligence or lack of due diligence in guarding his own interests.[25] Where a statute or rule of court requires agreements to extend the time for pleading, or for the trial, to be reduced to writing and filed, or communicated to the court, a mere oral agreement of the parties, not brought to the notice of the court, will not be sufficient to authorize the vacation of a judgment taken in violation of its terms.[26] It has nevertheless been held that, although oral stipulations are not regarded with favor,[27] relief may be granted on the basis of an oral agreement satisfactorily established.[28]

§ 272. —— Defenses to Action

In general, a judgment will not be opened or vacated on grounds which could have been pleaded in the original action.

Except where the motion to vacate is filed within the term at which the judgment was rendered,[29] a proceeding to open or vacate a judgment cannot be sustained on any grounds which might have been pleaded in defense to the action, and could have been so pleaded with proper care and diligence.[30] Within this rule are included various defenses,[31]

Fact that testator's widow orally agreed with certain of husband's heirs that, if they would offer no defense to her suit for construction of the will, she would execute a will whereby at her death the heirs would be devised all of the real property of the husband of which she should die possessed, was not valid ground for setting aside the decree in the will construction suit, since such oral promise was not fraud in the legal sense and was unenforceable under statute of frauds.—Sample v. Good defense is insufficient ground for setting aside judgment, unless judgment debtor brings himself within particular class to whom relief may be given.—Collins' Ex'rs v. Bonner, 294 S.W. 1027, 220 Ky. 212.

Disqualification of attorney
Attack on judgment for disqualification of other party's attorney was held too late, where no objection was made before judgment, although facts were known.—Dewey v. Frawley, 236 N.Y.S. 484, 227 App.Div. 757.

Matter available on motion for new trial
Where, on an equitable petition and an answer by defendant in the nature of a cross bill, the jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant on the special issues of fact submitted by the judge, and plaintiff's motion for new trial on general and special grounds was denied, and his writ of error from such judgment was dismissed by the supreme court, plaintiff could not in a subsequent petition or motion to set aside the verdict and judgment attack them on any grounds which either were included in previous motion for new trial or could in the exercise of reasonable diligence have been so included, if the grounds presented such questions as could be raised by motion for new trial.—Manry v. Stephens, 9 S.E.2d 58, 190 Ga. 305.

Individual or partnership liability
Where defendant defended as in action for individual liability, he might not have judgment vacated on ground based on partnership liability.—Pace v. Continental Supply Co., 251 P. 743, 120 Okl. 302.

31. Statute of limitations
Refusing to open judgment on pleadings to afford defendant opportunity to plead statute of limitations was held not abuse of discre-

such as payment;[32] set-off and counterclaim;[33] want or failure of consideration;[34] fraud as discussed supra § 269; forgery;[35] and illegality of the contract or transaction out of which the alleged cause of action arose,[36] except in so far as statutes have changed the rule,[37] or public policy requires the opening of the judgment to permit the introduction of such defense.[38] Moreover, if the parties were equally guilty in participating in an immoral or unlawful contract, the courts will give no relief after the recovery of a judgment thereon, but will leave them where they stand.[39]

Notwithstanding the general rule, where the pleading and trial of a defense is prevented by fraud, accident, or other cause for which the moving party is not to blame, the judgment may be opened or vacated to let in the defense;[40] and, as appears infra § 334, default judgments ordinarily will be opened to let in substantial defenses where the default is sufficiently excused. Also, while some authorities have held that a judgment will not be opened to let in a defense which has arisen since the entry of the judgment,[41] others have held that matter arising after judgment, or before judgment but too late to be presented as a defense, which would have been an effectual bar to the action if it had occurred in time to be presented as a defense, is ground for vacating the judgment.[42] In any event, the court will usually decline to open a judgment to let in a merely technical defense as distinguished from a meritorious defense.[43]

Subsequent changes in law. A judgment will not be opened or vacated on the ground that a statute becoming effective after the judgment would have warranted a different decision, where such statute does not purport to be curative.[44] Similarly, a judicial decree will not be set aside by reason of a change in the law, resulting from a subsequent decision by a higher court reaching a contrary conclusion.[45] The reason for the rule is that there

Champerty

Where defendants in quiet title action proceeded to trial on theory of validity of resale tax deed to county and commissioners' deed under which they claimed and appealed on same theory without attempting to inject defense of champerty, they could not assert such defense as grounds for vacating adverse judgment in quiet title action.—Dierks v. Walsh, Okl., 165 P.2d 354.

Change in law as to estate by curtesy

Finality of judgment that title by curtesy consummate existed in favor of husband to all lands of which Chickasaw wife became seized during coverture was held not subject to subsequent attack by motion to vacate as void after rule of law had been established by subsequent decision of a higher court that estate by curtesy did not attach.—Latimer must be an end to litigation, and it is the policy of the law to prohibit, as far as possible, the further contest of an issue once judicially decided and to accord finality to judgments.[46] However, a motion to open a judgment has been allowed where the higher court subsequently made a contrary decision on the identical facts.[47]

§ 273. —— Newly Discovered Evidence

Newly discovered evidence is ground for vacating a judgment, provided it could not have been discovered at the time of the trial, and it is material and such as to affect the decision.

Newly discovered evidence, as distinguished from matter newly arising which would have constituted a defense if it had occurred in time to be presented as a defense in the action, as considered supra § 272, is ground for vacating a judgment,[48] provided the party was ignorant of such evidence and could not have discovered it in time to adduce it at the trial, by the exercise of due diligence,[49] and provided the evidence is material and such as to affect the decision of the issue,[50] and not merely cumulative or additional to that which was introduced at the trial.[51] It has been held that the power to open or vacate a judgment for newly discovered evidence applies only during the term in which the judgment was rendered, and not after the expiration of the term.[52]

§ 274. —— Errors of Law

While a judgment may be opened or vacated during the term for errors of law, such relief ordinarily will not be granted after the expiration of the term.

During the term, a judgment may be opened or vacated for errors of law,[53] even though the error

Grounds for opening, not vacating
Where new evidence relating to the cause of action must be introduced in order to sustain an attack on a judgment, the judgment should not be vacated or set aside, but should be opened for the purpose of admitting the new evidence.—Nixon v. Nixon, 198 A. 154, 329 Pa. 256.

Failure to comply with statute
In suit on fire policy, defendant's motion to vacate judgment for plaintiff, which alleged that fact had been discovered since trial that plaintiff was not owner of building was properly overruled, where motion was not verified, no testimony was offered to support it, and no attempt was made to comply with statute relating to granting of new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence.—Farmers Union Mut. Where party seeks to set aside judgment for newly discovered evidence which could not have been produced before because the location of property in issue was not known, owing to the loss of the deeds, the party must show that the deeds were not recorded, or, if recorded, were improperly indexed, since otherwise slight effort would have disclosed a true description of the property.—Trustees of Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Central City v. (2) Where court had jurisdiction of parties and to administer legal and equitable relief, mistake, if any, in holding complaint sufficient to warrant both was judicial error, not irregularity.—Porter v. Alamocitos Land & Live Stock Co., 256 P. 179, 32 N.M. 344.

(3) Errors in permitting amendment of petition after judgment, and in fixing amount of attorney's fees, and in rendering judgment on verdict, were held not grounds for vacating judgment on motion filed after expiration of term at which judg-procedure may be authorized by statute,[56] or unless the error is one going to the jurisdiction;[57] and, while there is some authority to the contrary,[58] it has been held to be immaterial that the time for a review of the judgment has expired.[59]

Amount of judgment. A judgment may be vacated when rendered for an amount in excess of that claimed in the writ or declaration,[60] or where it includes an unauthorized allowance of damages in addition to the amount fixed by the jury,[61] unless the fault can be cured by reducing or remitting the excess,[62] or unless the excess is very trifling.[63] However, this cannot generally be done on account of an erroneous computation of the amount of damages or interest,[64] or on an allegation that the amount of the judgment is greater than the facts of the case will warrant.[65] It has been held that a judgment may be set aside on the ground of clear inadequacy of the amount awarded,[66] at least during the term.[67]

Taxation of costs. A judgment should not be set aside for irregularity in the taxing of costs, or error in the amount as taxed, the remedy being by motion to correct the judgment by reducing or otherwise changing the taxed costs.[68] The taxation of costs without notice as ground for setting aside a judgment is considered supra § 268.

§ 275. —— Errors of Fact

Errors of fact going to the validity or regularity of a judgment constitute grounds for opening or vacating the judgment.

Error or mistake of fact going to the validity or regularity of the judgment, such as furnished ground for the writ of error coram nobis at common law, discussed infra §§ 311, 312, has been held a ground, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, for opening or vacating the judgment.[69] Er-ment was rendered.—Duncan v. Wilkins, 229 P. 801, 103 Okl. 221.

34 C.J. p 290 note 44.

Error of law as "irregularity"

An "irregularity," within statute authorizing setting aside of a judgment for irregularity, does not embrace judicial error in rendition of judgment, and, where proceedings have been regular, court's power to correct judgment ceases with end of judgment term, regardless of how erroneous proceedings may have been.—State ex rel. Caplow v. Kirkwood, Mo.App., 117 S.W.2d 652—34 C. J. p 290 note 44 [a].

Unsupported judgment or conclusions of law

(1) Under statute so providing, a judgment may be vacated "and another and different judgment entered for either of the following causes materially affecting the substantial rights of such party and entitling him to a different judgment: 1. Incorrect or erroneous conclusions of law not consistent with or not supported by the findings of fact; and in such case when the judgment is set aside, the conclusions of law shall be amended and corrected. 2. A judgment not consistent with or not supported by the special verdict."—Irer v. Gawn, 277 P. 1053, 99 Cal.App. 17—Gale v. Dixon, 267 P. 342, 91 Cal.App. 529—34 C.J. p 290 note 44 [c].

rors of fact within this rule are errors in material matters, prejudicial to the judgment debtor, and which, if known, would have prevented rendition of the judgment.[70] Erroneous or mistaken findings as to facts in issue afford no ground for vacating the judgment.[71]

§ 276. —— Defects and Objections as to Parties

A judgment may be opened or vacated for serious defects or objections as to parties, and generally for the disability or death of a party.

A judgment may be vacated for nonjoinder of a necessary party,[72] or where it was rendered on a

Errors not appearing on face of record

(1) Statutory motion in nature of writ of error coram nobis is not available to review questions of fact arising on pleadings, being limited to matters not appearing of record.—Jacobson v. Ashkinaze, 168 N.E. 647, 337 Ill. 141.

(2) Under statute substituting motion for writ of error coram nobis and providing that motion may be made in writing within five years after rendition of final judgment on reasonable notice, certain errors of fact not appearing on face of record can be corrected on proper showing.—Grice v. Grice, 26 N.E.2d 747, 304 Ill.App. 584.

Effect of negligence

(1) Under statute substituting motion for writ of error coram nobis and providing that motion may be made in writing within five years after rendition of final judgment on reasonable notice, motion will not lie where party seeking relief is guilty of negligence.—Grice v. Grice, 26 N.E.2d 747, 304 Ill.App. 584.

(2) Failure of attorneys for plaintiff to attend call of calendar of certain judge which resulted in dismissal of cause for want of prosecution is not such negligence as bars vacation of judgment for error of fact on motion under the statute, where it appears that cause was improperly on calendar of such judge and was on calendar of another judge, to whom cause had been originally assigned, for call on same day, and that attorneys were present before such latter judge, and that attorneys for both parties were absent at call of first judge's calendar.—Reid v. Chicago Rys. Co., 231 Ill.App. 58.

Effect of statute on court's power

The statute authorizing a court in its discretion and on just terms, at any time within one year after notice, to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect is not a limitation on court's power to set aside a judgment based on stipulated facts where it appears that there was a mutual mistake concerning certain material facts.—Payton v. Rogers, 285 N.W. 873, 66 S.D. 486.

Errors held within rule

(1) Error in fact, to justify vacation of judgment, is not necessarily one which would have precluded rendition of judgment for lack of jurisdiction.—Baird & Warner, Inc., v. Roble, 250 Ill.App. 255.

(2) Where trial judge intended to pronounce judgment for defendants but signed a judgment for plaintiff, whose counsel had prepared findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment, the error in signing judgment was a "clerical error" and not a "judicial error," and hence trial court, on defendants' motion, had power to vacate findings and judgment on ground that they were signed as result of mistake.—Bastajian v. Brown, 120 P.2d 9, 19 Cal.2d 209.

(3) Mistakes of fact, justifying vacation of judgment, are not confined to omissions or misprisions of clerk of court.—Toth v. Samuel Phillipson & Co., 250 Ill.App. 247.

(4) Other errors.—Chicago Securities corporation v. Olsen, 14 N.E.2d 893, 295 Ill.App. 613—Hooper v. Wabash Automotive Corporation, 10 N.E.2d 892, 291 Ill.App. 618—Swiercz v. Nalepka, 259 Ill.App. 262—Reid v. Chicago Rys. Co., 231 Ill.App. 58.

Errors held not within rule

(1) Facts that cause was stricken off calendar through mistake, and inadvertence in office of plaintiff's attorney, and that, latter being ignorant of fact that case was within order striking certain cases from docket, it was again stricken from calendar, were held not errors of fact authorizing recall of judgment of dismissal.—Harris v. Chicago House-Wrecking Co., 145 N.E. 666, 314 Ill. 500.

(2) A trial court's entry of judgment, without observing court rules of record, such as rule requiring that testimony be taken down by court reporter, does not constitute "error of fact" entitling defendant to vacation of judgment on motion, as courts take judicial notice of their own records, which are always constructively before them.—Viedenschek v. Johnny Perkins Playdium, 49 N.E.2d 339, 319 Ill.App. 523.

(3) "Errors of fact" not arising on the trial of an action, which authorize the vacating of a judgment, do not include a failure to present a defense based on facts known to the party at the time of the original action.—Boslov v. Boslov, 31 N.Y.S.2d 970, 177 Misc. 817, affirmed 36 N.Y.S.2d 744, 264 App.Div. 943.

72. Ky.—Hazard Lumber & Supply Co. v. Horn, 15 S.W.2d 492, 228 Ky. 554.

34 C.J. p 291 note 61.

Demurrer held proper remedy

Judgment cannot be attacked by motion to set aside as beyond jurisdiction of court, where defect is of parties, demurrer being the proper remedy.—Royal Indemnity Co. v. Peebles Ceramic Products Co., 169 N.E. 39, 33 Ohio App. 247.

Vacation not warranted

Where action against county to quiet title was duly commenced by proper service on county auditor and defended by assistant prosecuting attorney, lack of knowledge by board of county commissioners of such action and board's failure to participate therein afforded no grounds for vacation of decree en-

joint contract against only some of the defendants,[73] or where it affects persons who were never made parties to the suit,[74] or where it appears that the real party in interest has not been joined,[75] although on the last point there is some authority to the contrary.[76] However, it has been held that a judgment good as to at least some of the defendants will not be stricken, although it may be opened;[77] and, except during the term in which the judgment was rendered,[78] a judgment will not be set aside because of the misnomer of a party, at least where it did not mislead, and is not calculated to work substantial injury;[79] nor will a judgment be set aside because of a technical objection, not appearing on the face of the record, to plaintiff's capacity to sue.[80]

Legal disability. Except in so far as there may be a waiver of the right to raise the objection,[81] legal disability, such as coverture, infancy, or insanity, of a party against whom a judgment is improvidently rendered without regard to such disability is ground for opening or vacating such judgment,[82] in some instances under statutes to that effect.[83] Such a case is one of mistake of fact,[84] as distinguished from irregularity.[85]

Death of party. It is competent and proper for the court to set aside a judgment which was rendered for or against a party after his death,[86] particularly where statutes so provide.[87] However, a party's death after judgment has been rendered does not warrant vacation of the judgment, even though the cause of action would not have survived.[88]

Bankruptcy of party. The bankruptcy of defendant has been held to be no ground for opening a judgment against him.[89]

§ 277. —— Defects and Objections as to Pleadings

While ordinarily a judgment will not be set aside for mere defects in the pleadings, it may be set aside where there is a fatal error.

tered therein.—Harter v. King County, 119 P.2d 919, 11 Wash.2d 583.

fects or insufficiency in the pleadings,[90] especially where the alleged fault is amendable,[91] or has been waived, as by joining issue and going to trial,[92] or has been cured by the verdict,[93] or otherwise will not result in a miscarriage of justice.[94] However, a judgment without a declaration to support it may be set aside as irregular;[95] and it has been held that a judgment will be set aside where there is a fatal error as to the pleadings.[96] A judgment for defendant on the pleadings for want of a reply may be vacated and plaintiff granted leave to reply.[97]

Failure to state cause of action. It has been held that since, where the declaration or complaint states no cause of action, or contains no averments showing liability on the part of defendant, the judgment based thereon is erroneous and reversible, but not void, as is discussed supra § 40, it is not subject to vacation on the ground of such insufficiency of the declaration or complaint,[98] in accordance with the

Petition held not insufficient
In suit to declare a resulting trust, petition alleging that plaintiffs' ancestor purchased the real estate involved and paid the consideration therefor and that defendant contributed no part of such consideration, containing no allegation that the ancestor had acted contrary to the law, was not insufficient as against motion filed after judgment term to set judgment for plaintiffs aside on ground of irregularity because of alleged fraudulent appropriation by ancestor.—Weatherford v. Pendency of demurrers undisposed of did not constitute defect on record authorizing setting aside judgment where petition was amendable.—Oliver v. Fireman's Ins. Co., 155 S.E. 227, 42 Ga.App. 99.

Particular defects
(1) Omission of prayer for process from petition held "amendable defect" within statute providing that judgment may not be set aside for any defects in pleadings or record that is aided by verdict or amendable as matter of form.—Guthrie v. Spence, 191 S.E. 188, 55 Ga.App. 669.

(2) Where plaintiff filed amended petition alleging that, by mistake and oversight, case was styled by name of another instead of plaintiff, court entered order directing that plaintiff's name be substituted, and subsequent proceedings were conducted in the name and for plaintiff's benefit under original title, plaintiff was party in interest and proceedings would not be set aside because of mistake in title.—Spence v. Particular defects
(1) Where petition by holder of note against maker alleged that note was delivered by payee to another and through a number of successive assignees was delivered to plaintiff, but it did not appear that the note was ever transferred by indorsement by payee or any of the assignees or that any of the assignees or holder had paid anything of value for the note, such defects in the petition were subject to amendment and were cured by verdict and judgment rendered thereon could not be set aside on ground that petition failed to state a cause of action.—Georgia Securities Co. v. Ward, 17 S.E.2d 605, 66 Ga.App. 182.

(2) In suit to recover alleged balance due of money advanced by plaintiff against his salesman's commission, where judgment was rendered against salesman when he failed to prosecute case after filing demurrer and answer, salesman was held not entitled to set aside judgment because of failure of petition to allege agreement that salesman was to return any excess of sums advanced over commissions earned, since such defect was cured by verdict and judgment.—Smith v. Franklin Printing Co., 187 S.E. 904, 54 Ga. App. 385.

Particular defects or objections
(1) Where defendants did not show that substantial justice required a new trial or that any real injustice was done by refusal of trial court to receive a special plea three years after entry of action by plaintiff, motion to vacate judgment was properly denied.—Lehigh Nav. Coal Co. v. Keene Coal Co., 197 A. 410, 89 N.H. 274.

(2) In claim and delivery, the fact that the complaint merely consisted of a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, together with a demand for relief, and did not formally set up the cause of action in claim and delivery, did not mislead defendant to his prejudice, within constitutional provision providing that no judgment shall be set aside for errors in pleadings unless resulting in a miscarriage of justice.—Faure v. Drollinger, 213 P. 724, 60 Cal.App. 594.

Certification by clerk
Judgment for amount of liquidated damages was properly set aside where it did not appear that copy of affidavit claim served on defendant was certified by clerk of court as required by statute.—Virginia-Lincoln Furniture Corporation v. Southern Factories & Stores Corporation, 174 S.E. 848, 162 Va. 767.

rule, considered supra § 274, that mere error in law is not ground for vacating a judgment after the term. Other courts, however, have held that failure of the declaration or complaint to state a cause of action is ground for vacating the judgment.[99]

§ 278. —— Unauthorized, Inadvertent, Improvident, or Premature Entry

A judgment may be set aside where its entry was unauthorized, inadvertent, improvident, or premature.

A judgment may be set aside where it was entered by the clerk without any authority therefor, whether his entry thereof was the result of mistake, inadvertence, or wrongful intent, and whether there was a total lack of authority to enter any judgment, or only a lack of authority to enter the particular judgment;[1] and the same is true where the entry was ordered by the court inadvertently, improvidently, or under a mistake.[2] A judgment may be stricken off where it is entered without the authority of the party in whose favor the judgment is entered and he disavows such entry.[3]

Premature entry. While there is some authority to the contrary,[4] it has been held that a judgment may be set aside where it was prematurely entered,[5] either because made before the return day, or the day fixed by law for entering judgments,[6] or before the time for answering or otherwise pleading had expired,[7] or while there was an answer or demurrer on file and not disposed of,[8] or before pleadings had been completed,[9] or because, for any other reason, it was made before the case was ripe for trial or regularity came on for hearing.[10]

§ 279. —— Disobedience of Order of Court or Other Misconduct of Party or Counsel

Where a judgment is entered in violation of a court order or direction it may be set aside, as may also a judgment obtained through the misconduct of a party's attorney.

A judgment may be set aside where it is entered in violation of a court order or direction,[11] as where it is entered in disobedience to an injunction or stay forbidding the further prosecution of the action, or in disregard of a pending order for a new trial.[12]

Misconduct of counsel. A judgment may be set aside where it was obtained through the fraudulent or dishonest conduct of a party's attorney, as where he deceives and misleads his client,[13] enters into a collusive arrangement with the opposing party or counsel,[14] or corruptly sells out his client's interests.[15] A judgment may also be set aside for such constructive fraud as is implied in the attorney's attempt to act for both parties,[16] or, out of hostility to his client, his secret withdrawal from the case and leaving it undefended.[17] It has even been held that the unauthorized withdrawal of an attorney without any circumstances of fraud or dishonesty is a sufficient ground for vacating the resulting judgment provided the client did not know of or consent to such withdrawal.[18]

However, where a party is actually represented by counsel in court, fully prepared to try the cause, and such counsel refuses to proceed for the sole reason that he thinks the justice presiding may decide against him, the judgment thus rendered cannot be vacated as though taken by default.[19]

a. In general

b. Mistake

c. Surprise

d. Excusable neglect

e. Act or fault of counsel

f. Casualty or misfortune

a. In General

In general the trial court may grant relief against judgments suffered by reason of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, casualty, or misfortune.

It is the general rule, in many jurisdictions by virtue of statutes so providing, that the trial court may, in its discretion, grant relief against judgments suffered by reason of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, casualty, or misfortune.[20] The most usual application of provisions of this nature is found in the case of judgments entered by default, as appears infra § 334; and some such statutes apply only where the party, by reason of some mistake, inadvertence, etc., failed to be present or represented at the trial.[21] Such statutes are entitled to a liberal interpretation so as to advance the

Relief from act of court only
The statute authorizing persons against whom judgment has been rendered in action wherein no trial has been had, to petition supreme court for a trial, was not intended to furnish relief against voluntary acts of such person, but only against act of court in rendering judgment under the conditions definitely set out in the statute.—Girard v. Sawyer, 9 A.2d 854, 64 R.I. 43.

During term only
It has been held under some statutes that the power to set aside a judgment for mistake, inadvertence, or neglect is confined to the term in which the judgment is rendered and does not apply after the term.—State ex rel. Spillman v. Commercial State Bank of Omaha, 10 N.W.2d 268, 143 Neb. 490—State Life Ins. Co. of Indianapolis, Ind. v. Heffner, 269 N.W. 629, 131 Neb. 700.

Legal reasons
To authorize vacation of judgment, facts shown by applicant must constitute mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect as matter of law, and erroneous reliance on reasons which would merely constitute everyday excuse for suffering judgment to be rendered will not suffice.—Salazar v. Steelman, 71 P.2d 79, 22 Cal.App.2d 402.

remedy.[22] However, relief should not be granted where to do so would be to grant a new trial at the capricious demand of a party who was either grossly negligent or had simply changed his mind after the judgment;[23] and relief should be granted only when it is sought in good faith and when no injustice will result therefrom.[24] It has been held that under such statutes a judgment may be set aside for fraud[25] and that in such case it is immaterial whether the fraud was extrinsic or intrinsic.[26]

Judgment on verdict, findings, or conclusions. It has been held that a statute authorizing the setting aside of a judgment for "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," does not apply to such judgments as necessarily follow a verdict, the setting aside of which, without at the same time disturbing the verdict, would be of no advantage to the party, as the verdict would stand even if the judgment were vacated, and such verdict could not be set aside after the term;[27] and the same rule has been held to apply to judgments which follow findings of fact or conclusions of law.[28]

In general a judgment taken against a person by mistake may be opened or vacated provided the mistake is one of fact.

Under numerous statutes a judgment taken against a person by mistake may be opened or vacated;[29] but this applies only to mistakes of fact, not to mistakes of law,[30] unless otherwise provided by the statute.[31] If the statute gives the right to open or vacate a judgment taken against a party through "his" mistake, no mistake made by any other person will justify this action;[32] but in the ab-

Concealment of facts

The concealment from court by vendor of agricultural land of fact of its actual forfeiture of vendee's rights under conditional sales agreement constituted a "fraud" justifying an order setting aside a summary judgment granting vendor the proceeds derived from sales of crops growing upon the land, which proceeds had been assigned by vendee as security for payment of portion of purchase price.—Security-First Nat. Relief denied

(1) A defendant who did not appear, demur, answer, or otherwise plead to petition in belief that his property could not be reached by execution, was held not entitled to have the judgment vacated.—Bell v. Knoble, 225 P. 897, 99 Okl. 110.

Consolidated Yarns, 163 A. 544, 53 R.I. 50.

Mistake of court

(1) Error in the decision of the issue directly before the court is not, in the legal sense, a "mistake" for which the judgment may be impeached.—Bradford v. Trapp, 198 P. 584, 49 Cal.App. 493.

(2) Statutes authorizing the vacating of an order made as result of mistake, omission, inadvertence, or defect or through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect refers to the parties or their attorneys and not to mistake, omission, sence of such a restriction the mistake may be one made by plaintiff, whereby he fails to secure all he is entitled to,[33] a mutual mistake or misunderstanding of the parties,[34] or a mistake of the court arising from misinformation or misunderstanding as to matters of fact,[35] or even the mistake of an entire stranger, which affects the action of the parties, or the progress of the cause, and the entry of judgment.[36] The mistake must have been one which was excusable under the circumstances; an inexcusable mistake is no ground for opening the judgment.[37] A motion for relief on the ground that defendant was prevented by a mistake from being present at the trial and making his defense will not be granted where the defense set up in the moving papers is entirely new, and not disclosed by the original pleadings.[38]

As to cause of action. A judgment will not generally be set aside on account of a mistake as to the identity of the suit or the cause of action, as where the party erroneously supposes the action is brought on one claim or obligation, although it is really on another,[39] unless there are strong circumstances to show that the mistake was natural and excusable and productive of decided injustice.[40] However, a mistake as to the capacity in which the party is sued, as where he supposes the action to be against him in an official capacity, when he is really sued as an individual or vice versa, may be ground for vacating the judgment,[41] except where it is inexcusable;[42] and this is true of a mistake as to plaintiff's capacity or title to sue.[43] Where by mistake a party splits his cause of action, the judgment rendered in the action first brought may be vacated as it bars another action for the balance of the party's claim.[44]

As to time for pleading or trial. A party who makes an honest and excusable mistake as to the time when he is required to plead or answer, or as to the time of the trial, whereby he is prevented from making his defense in due season, may have judgment opened or set aside;[45] but not where the mistake was the result of his own heedlessness or lack of due attention and care.[46] A party ordinarily is bound to take notice of the time and place where the court sits and of the condition of the calendar.[47] However, a judgment rendered in the absence of defendant and of his counsel should be set aside where such absence was caused by their reliance on a statement made officially by the judge of the court that the case could not be reached, or would not be tried, before a certain date, or that nothing further would be done without notifying counsel,[48] or where they were similarly misinformed and misled by the clerk of the court,[49] or by the calendar or official list of cases set for trial,[50] or by counsel for the adversary party;[51] but some cases hold that even such official assurances will not

Clerk's failure to notify
(1) In absence of statute or rule of court, it is not duty of court clerk to notify party or his attorney of setting of cause for trial, and failure to do so is not ground to vacate judgment rendered in absence of such party or his attorney.—McCandless v. Childs, 239 P. 254, 113 Okl. 97.

(2) It is not sufficient grounds on which to vacate judgment that neither plaintiffs nor their attorneys of record were notified by the clerk of the court at the time that the case was set for trial.—Ross v. Irving, 220 P. 642, 96 Okl. 124.

relieve litigants or their counsel from the duty of exercising the utmost vigilance in watching the progress of their cases.[52]

As to process. A person served with a summons must make sure that he understands what it is, by reading it or having it read to him, since he cannot have a judgment set aside on the ground that he mistook it for a subpœna or for a notice in another suit,[53] or a suit against him in a representative instead of an individual capacity or vice versa,[54] unless he failed to receive a copy of the writ and was misled by the officer as to its purport,[55] or where the copy was so illegible that the command of the writ could not be ascertained and obeyed,[56] or where there was some other sufficient excuse.[57]

As to retainer of counsel. A defendant ordinarily cannot procure the setting aside of a judgment against him on the ground of his mistaken belief that he had retained an attorney to protect his interests for he must see to it that the attorney understands and accepts the retainer, and his failure to pay personal attention to the case is inexcusable negligence.[58] However, there are cases of this kind where the court, in the exercise of its discretion, has granted relief.[59] Where the mistake was as to the employment of counsel by a person whom defendant justifiably relied on to attend to that matter as a codefendant, or a business agent, it may furnish cause for vacating the judgment.[60]

As to validity and regularity of proceedings. A mistake as to the validity or regularity of the proceedings is one of law, not of fact, and therefore a defendant cannot have a judgment set aside because he erroneously believed that the service of process on him was illegal[61] or that the proceedings were otherwise irregular or invalid.[62]

Ignorance as excuse. The illiteracy of a defendant, or ignorance of the English language, of the course of judicial procedure, or of his rights and duties, will furnish no excuse for failing to defend the action, or justify the vacation of the judgment, where he at least knew that he had been sued, and neglected to ask information or advice from others,[63] although it may be otherwise where such ignorance prevented him from discovering that legal proceedings had been taken against him until after the rendition of the judgment,[64] or where plaintiff has taken a fraudulent or deceitful advantage of his ignorance,[65] or where defendant was not negligent and asked information or advice from others but was given no notice of the case being set for trial.[66]

c. Surprise

Judgments usually may be opened or vacated on the ground that they were obtained through surprise of the party injuriously affected.

Under the statutes in many jurisdictions judgments may be opened or vacated on the ground that they were obtained through some surprise of the party injuriously affected,[67] provided such surprise could not have been avoided by the exercise of due diligence.[68]

What constitutes "surprise" within rule. The surprise contemplated by the statute is some condition or situation in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed to his injury, without any fault or negligence of his own, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against.[69] However, this

Change in law by subsequent decision

Where supreme court decision, rendered after trial court granted defendants' motion for judgment on pleadings in action for malicious prosecution, established that amended complaint stated cause of action because it sufficiently alleged that particular criminal proceeding against plaintiff for embezzlement was terminated by final judgment of dismissal after trial, trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting plaintiff's motion to vacate judgment on ground of "surprise."—Miller v. does not include surprise occasioned by a ruling or decision of the court,[70] the unexpected introduction or rejection of evidence at the trial,[71] or the calling of the case for trial before defendant thought it could possibly be reached.[72]

The unanticipated transfer of the case to another court may constitute legal surprise,[73] and so may the taking of judgment contrary to an agreement to postpone the time for answering or for the trial,[74] or a mistake as to the employment of counsel,[75] or a misunderstanding among several counsel for the defense as to who was charged with the duty of filing the answer.[76] There is no legal "surprise" where the judgment was given by consent of the party's attorney, and the contention is merely that he exceeded his authority.[77]

A party may be relieved against a judgment taken against him through his excusable neglect.

Under the statutes in many states a party may be relieved against a judgment taken against him through his "excusable neglect," which means a lack of attention to the progress of his cause, or failure to attend the trial, which is excused or justified by the peculiar circumstances of the case.[78] However, the term "excusable neglect" has no fixed legal meaning,[79] the question being one of fact dependent on the circumstances of each case;[80] but whether the facts found or admitted constitute excusable neglect is a conclusion of law,[81] unless different inferences as to the ultimate fact might reasonably be drawn by different minds, in which case it is a question of fact.[82]

Negligence may be excusable where it is caused by failure to receive notice of the action or the trial,[83] by an accident or chain of accidents which could not have been avoided or controlled,[84] by a genuine and excusable mistake or miscalculation,[85]

Implication of active misconduct

"Surprise, in the legal sense of the term, that would defeat a judgment, always involves the idea that there has been active misconduct on part of the plaintiff amounting to much the same thing as fraud."—Turley v. Taylor, 6 Baxt., Tenn., 376, 390.

Facts held not to constitute "surprise"

(1) Where mineral deed, bearing notary's certificate that his commission expired on date before that of deed, was in grantee's possession approximately twenty years, parties suing to remove cloud thereof from their title to land containing minerals conveyed specifically denied in reply, filed some time before trial, that deed was validly registered, and record of notaries' commissions in governor's office was available at all times to grantee, he could not claim surprise or inadvertence entitling him to vacation of judgment for plaintiffs because such record showed that notary's commission expired after execution of deed.—Crissman v. Palmer, 35 S.E.2d 422, 225 N. C. 472.

(2) Judgment in partition proceedings would not be set aside because plaintiff did not receive as much land as he expected, where judge had indicated by his opinion previously filed just how property was to be partitioned and had authorized a surveyor to prepare a map showing courses and distances in accordance with directions contained in opinion, and immediately preceding drawing of decree, all of parties with their respective attorneys had met with judge and agreed to waive findings, it not appearing that decree as signed by judge departed in any degree from conclusions announced.—Chavez v. by reliance on assurances given by those on whom the party had a right to depend, as the adverse party or counsel retained in the case, or a competent business adviser, that it would not be necessary for him to take an active part in the case or that the suit would not be prosecuted,[86] by relying on another person to attend to the case for him, when such other person promised to do so or was chargeable with that duty,[87] by a well-founded belief that the case would not be reached for trial as quickly as it was in fact reached,[88] or by other circumstances not involving fault of the moving party.[89]

Diligence required of suitors. A party seeking relief against a judgment on the ground of excusable negligence must clear himself of the imputation of want of due diligence, and he cannot have relief if the taking of the judgment appears to have been due to his own carelessness, slothfulness, or indifference to his own rights.[90] Thus, in order to put himself in a position where he can claim relief against an adverse judgment, suffered by reason of excusable neglect, he must, unless he means to try his own case, retain an attorney practicing in the particular court,[91] and, as appears supra subdivision b of this section, see that his attorney understands and accepts the retainer. In case his counsel dies, or withdraws or is discharged from the case,[92] or is otherwise unable to handle the case properly,[93] he must promptly engage another, unless he is excused therefrom by ignorance of the facts requiring it, in which case he must act promptly on discovery of the facts.[94]

It is the duty of a party to inform his counsel fully of the facts constituting his cause of action or defense,[95] and to be personally active in procuring witnesses, collecting evidence, and otherwise preparing for trial, the mere employment of counsel not being sufficient to excuse the party from giving the case his personal attention.[96] A party must keep himself informed of the progress of the case, not relying on such news as he can obtain from persons not bound to keep him advised,[97] and, particu-

e. Act or Fault of Counsel

(1) In general
(2) Mistake

(1) In General

A trial court may, in its discretion, open or vacate a judgment rendered against a party as a result of accident, negligence, or surprise of such party's attorney.

In a proper case, a trial court may, in its discretion, open or vacate a judgment rendered against a party as a result of the accident, mistake, negligence, or surprise of such party's attorney.[1] It is a general rule that the negligence of an attorney is imputable to his client, and that the latter cannot be relieved from a judgment taken against him in consequence of the neglect, carelessness, forgetfulness, or inattention of the former,[2] unless such neglect was excusable under the circumstances.[3] This rule applies not only where the negligence of the attorney consisted in his failure to enter an appearance, or to file a plea, or answer in due season,[4] but also where it consisted in a failure to pursue and follow up the case with due care and watchfulness,[5] in accordance with the diligence required of suitors, considered supra subdivision d of this section.

There are, however, a considerable number of cases in which it has been held, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, that, where the party himself has not been guilty of negligence, a judgment against him may be set aside because obtained through the negligence of his counsel.[6] While such relief has been granted on a showing that the at-

Parent's reliance on codefendant child

Mass.—Herlihy v. Kane, 38 N.E.2d 620, 310 Mass. 457.

Foreign attorney

The code provision relating to the setting aside of a judgment entered against a party through neglect of an "attorney" of such party to file or serve any paper within time limited therefor refers to neglect of an attorney having authority and owing duty to represent the litigant in the courts of the state, and does not include acts of a foreign attorney who is forbidden by law to practice in the state.—Cleek v. Virginia Gold torney is insolvent and therefore unable to make good his fault by paying damages,[7] according to some decisions relief should be granted without regard to the financial responsibility of the attorney.[8] The negligence of an attorney may be excusable, when attributable to an honest mistake, an accident, or any cause which is not incompatible with proper diligence on his part, and in these circumstances it will be proper to set aside or open the judgment taken in consequence thereof.[9] However, in any case the client himself must be free from fault, and negligence of his counsel is not excusable negligence, for which a judgment will be set aside, if the client wholly neglected the case and took no interest in its issue.[10] He must show that he employed counsel practicing habitually in the particular court, or who specially agreed to attend to the case.[11]

When an attorney is employed simply to retain counsel to appear at another place, he is a mere agent, and his negligence is imputable to his client;[12] and likewise the negligence of any person who is delegated or employed by the attorney to attend to the case is imputable to the attorney himself, and will not be excusable in the one unless it would have been in the other.[13]

Misunderstanding. While it has been held that the mere fact of a misunderstanding between a party and his attorney is insufficient to deprive the other party of his judgment,[14] it usually has been held that where a defense is not interposed, and judgment is consequently suffered, through a genuine and accidental misunderstanding between the party and his counsel, the judgment may be set aside,[15] except where either is chargeable with inexcusable negligence or carelessness, without which the misunderstanding would not have arisen.[16] The rule is similar where the misunderstanding was between different counsel retained on the same side, or between the attorneys for the opposing parties, or opposing counsel and a party, the courts holding this sufficient ground for vacating the judgment.[17] In all such cases, however, in order that the judgment may be set aside, it is necessary that the facts shall be fully explained and that the mistake shall be shown to be excusable.[18]

(2) Mistake

A genuine and reasonable mistake of fact made by a party's attorney may be a ground for opening or vacating a judgment against the party resulting from such mistake.

A mistake of the party's counsel, as well as a mistake of his own, may be pleaded as a reason for opening or vacating a judgment, provided it was genuine and reasonable, and a mistake of fact rather than of law,[19] such as counsel's mistaking the case in which he was retained or becoming confused between several similar cases,[20] or his misunderstanding of the real facts of the case or the circumstances of the transaction out of which the suit arose,[21] or his erroneous impression that the action

Unauthorized compromise

A judgment based on unauthorized compromise of claim by attorney may be vacated on seasonable application.—Harris v. Diamond Const. Co., Va., 36 S.E.2d 573.

Relief denied

(1) The trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside judgment and stay proceedings thereon until disposition of garnishment and execution proceedings against judgment debtor by creditors of judgment creditor's assignor on ground of reasonable and justifiable mistake of law by judgment debtor's counsel in believing that proper remedy was interpleader action against execution and garnishee creditors.—Kent v. had been discontinued[22] or settled.[23]

Time for appearance or pleading or trial. A judgment may be vacated or opened when the failure to defend was due to a mistake or miscalculation of the party's attorney as to the time allowed him for appearing, pleading, or taking some other step in the action,[24] as to the term of court at which the case would be tried,[25] or the day of the term or hour of the day,[26] or as to its being on the calendar for trial,[27] or as to the time when it would probably be reached for trial in its order,[28] provided, always, there was sufficient excuse for the mistake.[29]

Ignorance or mistake of law. It is a general rule that a party cannot be relieved from a judgment taken against him in consequence of the ignorance or mistake of his counsel with respect to the law, whether it concerns the rights or duties of the client, the legal effect of the facts in the case, or the rules of procedure.[30] However, there are cases where relief has been granted largely, if not entirely, on the ground of ignorance or mistake of law.[31]

Erroneous advice. It has generally been held not to be good ground for setting aside a judgment that it was suffered by the party in consequence of receiving erroneous advice from his attorney as to the necessity of making a defense or as to the validity of his defense;[32] but some courts have granted relief on this ground.[33]

f. Casualty or Misfortune

A party may have an adverse judgment opened or vacated on the ground that he was prevented by unavoidable casualty or misfortune from properly prosecuting or defending the action.

Under the statutes of many states, a party may have a judgment adverse to him opened or vacated on the ground that he was prevented by unavoidable casualty or misfortune from properly prosecuting or defending the action in which it was rendered.[34] The "unavoidable casualty or misfortune," for which a judgment may be opened or vacated is an accident or mishap arising from causes beyond the party's control, and against which he could not have guarded in the exercise of due foresight and diligence.[35]

Absence of party. The mere fact that a party was absent from the trial is not cause for setting the judgment aside, where his absence is not excused or shown to have been unavoidable.[36] How-

Facts constituting unavoidable casualty

(1) Where trial court granted a continuance to defendant, judgment rendered against him, through oversight of judge and without setting aside continuance and without notifying defendant or his counsel of such action was, as to defendant, an unavoidable casualty, and was properly vacated.—K. & S. Sales Co. v. Lee, 261 S.W. 903, 164 Ark. 449.

(2) However, fact that church records had been negligently lost, and that church's former name had been forgotten, was held not "unavoidable casualty or misfortune" such as to warrant setting aside order in probate proceedings decreeing that devise to church having different name from applicant had failed.—In re Jones' Estate, 27 P.2d 237, 138 Kan. 531, rehearing denied First Colored Baptist Church v. ever, it is a good excuse if he shows that he was compelled to absent himself from the trial by a constraint which he was bound to obey, or a cause which he could not control,[37] provided reasonable diligence and foresight was exercised to anticipate and avoid, or to overcome, the obstacles.[38] Similarly the absence of defendant from the state or beyond the seas at the time of the trial will be cause for setting aside the judgment if he could not have been present, and his absence operated to his prejudice,[39] provided he is not chargeable with negligence or lack of proper attention to his case.[40]

Absence of counsel. The mere absence of one's attorney at the time of the trial is no cause for setting aside a judgment[41] unless it is shown that, had he been present, he could have gone to trial, or that he could have presented good grounds for a continuance[42] and that injustice and injury have resulted to the client in consequence thereof[43] or that the attorney's absence was excusable or unavoidable under the circumstances.[44] It has been considered a sufficient excuse that the attorney was engaged at the time in trying a case in another court,[45] or was in attendance on another court as a witness[46] unless such attendance was voluntary and without subpœna,[47] or, being out of town, was unexpectedly detained[48] or was delayed by obstruction to travel,[49] or even that the mere multiplicity and pressure of his professional engagements prevented him from giving attention to the case.[50]

Some cases, however, take a stricter view of the attorney's obligations, and hold that if he has cases coming on in different courts he must obtain leave of absence from one court or the other, and arrange that neither case shall be proceeded with in his absence,[51] that if he is likely to be detained elsewhere he must apply for a continuance or extension of time,[52] that if he is detained on his way to the place of trial he should telegraph to the judges and ask to have the case held,[53] and that it is no excuse for his voluntary absence that he believed the case would not be reached before his return.[54] Many cases have refused to accept the excuse that the attorney was detained elsewhere by important business, even when it was of a public character, such as his attendance on the legislature, of which he was a member.[55]

Illness of party or relative. If a party is prevented by sickness from preparing his case or attending the trial, and the circumstances are such that his personal attention and presence are necessary to the due protection of his rights, a judgment against him may be set aside on the ground of "casualty or misfortune," or of "excusable neglect."[56] It is otherwise, however, where the party's interests were, or could have been, adequately protected by attorney or agent without the personal presence or attention of the party,[57] or where the character and duration of the illness were not such as in fact to obstruct the due prosecution or defense of the action,[58] or where the exercise of due diligence would have prevented or obviated the alleged consequence of such sickness.[59] The illness of a member of a party's family, or of any other relative, while it may be ground for a continuance, is generally held to be no cause for setting aside the judgment;[60] but in many cases judgments have been opened or vacated largely, if not altogether, on the ground of serious sickness of a close relative actually preventing attendance of the party.[61]

Illness or death of counsel or relative. The illness of a party's counsel, so severe as to prevent him from appearing and trying the case, is good ground for vacating the judgment, provided such party did not know of it in time to retain other counsel or was prevented in some other way from doing so.[62] The same rule applies in case of the illness or death of a member of the attorney's family, or a near relative, withdrawing his attention from professional business, and leaving the client without legal aid and without the opportunity to retain other counsel.[63] The death of one's attorney has been held to be an "unavoidable casualty" and, as such, ground for vacating a judgment.[64]

§ 281. —— Other Grounds

The sufficiency of various other grounds for opening or vacating judgment has been adjudicated, including the consent of the parties and the disability, disqualification, or misconduct of the judge.

In addition to the matters considered supra §§ 266–280, the courts have determined the sufficiency of other matters as ground for opening or vacating a judgment.[65] The generality of the court's judgment or decree,[66] the lack of authority of the attorneys who instituted the suit,[67] and the fact that the judgment was obtained by duress[68] have been held not ground for opening or vacating a judgment.

Agreement or consent. Where a court has jurisdiction to set aside a judgment for specified reasons, it may do so on consent of parties without specifying any grounds;[69] and where the parties enter into an otherwise valid agreement for the vacation of a judgment such agreement is binding and enforceable.[70] However, it is error to vacate a judgment on an agreement not supported by a consideration.[71] Where, after the court has ordered commissioners to partition land, defendants file exceptions and present a valid written agreement for partition made by the parties, the court will vacate its order, and direct a partition according to the agreement, the partition by the parties being paramount to one made by the officers of the court.[72]

Juror's false answers on voir dire

In statutory proceeding to vacate judgment because of misstatements of juror on voir dire examination, relief would not be granted on mere showing that juror did not answer truthfully and fully, but only on showing of prejudice, and in action against railroad for injuries, where juror's voir dire examination indicated that he was more favorable to railroad, juror's misstatements to the effect that no member of his family had been involved in personal injuries case, whereas he had been involved in accidents resulting in personal injuries, and his son had been sued for personal injuries, were held not to require vacation of judgment against railroad in statutory proceeding, especially where judgment had been affirmed by appellate court, and leave to appeal to supreme court had been denied.—Maher v. Oral agreement

A naked oral agreement for the setting aside of a judgment entered into after the rendition of the judgment is insufficient to require that the judgment be set aside.—Smith v. Cone, 156 S.E. 612, 171 Ga. 697.

Inability to comply with agreement

Equity will not enforce agreement to vacate judgment, where judgment debtors seeking enforcement have not complied therewith, although given ample opportunity.—Chambers v. Investors' Syndicate, 10 P.2d 339, 154 Okl. 142.

72. Tex.—High v. Tarver, Civ.App., 25 S.W. 1098.

The effect of the consent of the parties on the power of the court to vacate a judgment after the expiration of the term in which the judgment was rendered is considered supra § 230.

Disability, disqualification, or misconduct of judge. Insanity of the judge or referee who tried the case is not necessarily ground for vacating the judgment,[73] but where the mental capacity to render a proper judgment was lacking the judgment should be set aside.[74] It has been held that disqualification of the judge rendering a judgment is ground for vacating it,[75] particularly where such disqualification renders the judgment void.[76] However, it has also been held that disqualification of the judge renders the judgment merely voidable so that the remedy is by appeal and not by motion to vacate.[77]

Misconduct of judge has been held ground for vacating the judgment.[78]

§ 282. Defenses to Relief

The sufficiency of particular matters as defenses to a motion to open or vacate a judgment has been considered.

The sufficiency of particular matters as defenses to a motion to open or vacate a judgment has been considered with respect to such matters as the lapse of the term, supra § 230, the expiration of the statutory limitation of time or laches, infra § 288, and other matters.[79]

§ 283. —— Other Remedies Available

Subject to some exceptions, a motion to vacate will not be entertained when the proper remedy is by some other proceeding, such as by appeal.

Except where such remedies are cumulative under the governing statutes,[80] a motion to vacate or set aside a judgment will not be entertained when the proper remedy of the party aggrieved is by appeal, error, or certiorari,[81] but it has been held that the availability of the remedy of appeal will not bar the remedy of vacation of the judgment where the judgment is absolutely void.[82] The same rule has been held to apply where the proper remedy was

Joint or several judgment
A solidary judgment against comakers of note who were personally cited would not give rise to an action of nullity on ground that judgment was erroneous in that it should have been a joint one against comakers each only for virile share instead of against each for the whole, since error, if any, could have been corrected on appeal.—Wunderlich v. § 284. —— Waiver and Estoppel

The right to vacation of a judgment may be lost by waiver or estoppel.

While it has been held that estoppel may not be invoked in support of an invalid proceeding or a void judgment,[89] in general a person who would ordinarily be entitled to apply for the vacation of a judgment may waive the right to such relief, or be estopped by his conduct to ask for it.[90] The right to have a judgment opened on the ground of fraud may be waived by the party injured, or he may be estopped by his subsequent conduct to apply for such relief.[91]

Conduct constituting waiver or estoppel. Waiver or estoppel generally results where the party injured acquiesces in the rendition of the judgment,[92] or in the effect of the judgment as rendered,[93] or acknowledges its binding force,[94] or receives and retains benefits accruing to him under it,[95] or voluntarily pays the amount of it,[96] or suffers his property to be sold on execution without objection,[97] or where the party against whom an interlocutory judgment is taken submits to and ratifies it by participating in the further proceedings in the action,[98] or generally by proceeding in the cause without objection to errors or defects which may be waived, and which could have been cured on timely objection.[99] Where two entries of a judgment for the same debt are made by mistake, and the debtor contrives to procure an entry of satisfaction of the first, he is estopped to have the second vacated for irregularity.[1]

(3) Certainly defendant was not precluded from prosecuting his motion to set aside judgment because defendant had previously filed a skeleton motion for new trial which was dismissed by trial court on ground that defendant had abandoned it.—Kalil v. Spivey, supra.

Pursuit of other remedies. It has generally been held that a party waives his right to apply for the vacation of a judgment by pursuing other remedies,[2] as by taking an appeal from it,[3] or by instituting an independent action for substantially the same relief,[4] although there is also some authority to the contrary.[5] Where a ground for the vacation of a judgment is asserted as a ground for a new trial but is withdrawn before the motion for new trial is ruled on, it has been held that there is no estoppel to assert such ground in a petition to vacate the judgment.[6]

§ 285. —— Assignment of Judgment or Rights Thereunder

Subject to statutory qualifications, the assignee or purchaser of a judgment or rights thereunder cannot set up his rights to prevent its being opened or vacated.

Except as the rule may be affected by statute, the assignee of a judgment, or a subsequent purchaser of rights affected thereby, cannot set up his rights to prevent its being opened or vacated, as he stands in no better position than his assignor, or vendor.[7]

The effect of the assignment of judgments on the rights and liabilities of the parties generally is considered infra §§ 521–528.

f. Indirect or implied vacation

a. In General

Unless clearly so intended, a statutory mode of proceeding for the vacation of a judgment is not the exclusive remedy for the purpose.

In order to open or vacate a judgment there must be a direct proceeding for that purpose, not a mere incident to the progress of the cause or to the execution of the judgment, and one which is appropriate to the relief sought;[8] and a judgment cannot be

Plaintiff's motion to set aside judgment, dismissing complaint on merits for want of jurisdiction to enter it because of failure to join issue by answer or demurrer to complaint and on order to show cause, was properly denied, where plaintiff moved for final judgment, and so acted as to consent to decision on agreed statement of facts.—Luebke v. Judge's disqualification
Judgment will not be set aside on attack by party with knowledge of judge's disqualification before trial on ground of such disqualification, when record shows consent, and it is not necessary for record to use word "consent" or its equivalent.—Gulf States Steel Co. v. Christison, 154 So. 565, 228 Ala. 622.

Capacity in which party appears
If a person submits himself to the jurisdiction of court and litigates throughout in any particular capacity, he will not be permitted after an adverse result to impeach the decree as to himself on the ground that his capacity was in fact different.—Hubbard v. Massie, 4 So.2d 494, 192 Miss. 95.

Facts held not to constitute waiver Fact that defendants, discovering trial judge's disqualification, promptly but erroneously moved in supreme court rather than trial court to vacate judgment, did not show waiver.—Cadenasso v. Bank of Italy, 6 P.2d 944, 214 Cal. 562.

nullified by agreement of the parties.[9] In a number of jurisdictions provision is made by statute for the opening and vacating of judgments, but, unless the statutory procedure is exclusive,[10] a statutory mode of proceeding for this purpose is not the exclusive remedy, but is cumulative to the common-law right to proceed in proper time and form for the setting aside of the judgment.[11] Where the statutory procedure is followed, strict compliance with the statute may be necessary.[12]

Proceedings to open a judgment have been said to be equitable in nature[13] and in substance;[14] but at least one court has declined to entertain applications to vacate judgments except in simple cases, the remedy in chancery being deemed a better mode of investigation.[15]

It has been said that the power to vacate judgments may be exercised by the court on suggestion by a party or interested person,[16] that a judgment procured by fraud on the court may be vacated or set aside at any time on the suggestion of any interested party,[17] that, during the term at which the judgment was rendered, the judgment may be vacated on mere suggestion[18] of a party in interest,[19]

Specific and general statutes

General statute giving court control of its own records, with right to amend or expunge them, must be read in light of other provisions of statute, and does not alone control method of vacating judgments, since vacation of judgment is specifically treated by statute.—Workman v. District Court, Delaware County, 269 N.W. 27, 222 Iowa 364.

During or after term

(1) In some jurisdictions the procedure for vacating judgments during term is not controlled by statute.—Mosher v. Mutual Home & Savings Ass'n, Ohio App., 41 N.E.2d 871.

(2) In such a jurisdiction, a statute relating to the vacation of judgments after term provides a cumulative and not an exclusive remedy.—Vida v. Parsley, Ohio App., 47 N.E.2d 663.

(3) Courts may vacate a judgment during term without following all provisions of statutes applicable to vacation of judgments after term.—National Guaranty & Finance Co. v. Lindimore, Ohio App., 31 N.E.2d 155.

Judgment without jurisdiction

(1) Judgment void for want of jurisdiction may be vacated at any time on motion of party affected thereby without compliance with statutes otherwise applying to vacating judgments.—Taylor v. Focks Drilling & Manufacturing Corporation, 62 P.2d 903, 144 Kan. 626.

(2) The statute relating to procedure to vacate or modify judgment does not apply to proceedings to vacate a judgment entered without jurisdiction.—Martin Bros. Box Co. v. Fritz, 292 N.W. 143, 228 Iowa 482.

Statute limiting time for proceedings

Statute providing that judgments in any court of record shall not be set aside for irregularity, on motion, unless such motion be made within three years after term at which judgment was rendered, does not make remedy there available exclusive or condition precedent to review proceedings; where more than one method of procedure is available for correction of irregularities patent on record and errors of fact calling for introduction of evidence dehors record, and for prevention of miscarriage of justice, litigant should be permitted to exercise his choice of methods.—Crabtree v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 111 S.W.2d 103, 341 Mo. 1173.

Judgment that is not void on its face can be attacked only under some statutory provision and in manner therein provided.—Latimer v. Vanderslice, 62 P.2d 1197, 178 Okl. 501—Walker v. Gulf Pipe Line Co., 226 P. 1046, 102 Okl. 7.

Rule as substitute for bill in equity and that the exercise of the broad power to set aside a judgment during the term is not hampered by the ordinary rules of procedure.[20] The power of the court to act on its own motion is considered infra § 287.

The employment, at common law, of a writ of error coram nobis as a remedy to obtain the vacation of a judgment, and its supercession, in most jurisdictions, by a summary motion to vacate the judgment, are discussed infra §§ 311–313. The former and the present status of the writ of audita querela as a remedy for this purpose are treated in Audita Querela. Equitable relief against judgments is considered infra §§ 341–400, and the vacation of decrees in equity, in Equity §§ 622–667. Procedure and relief in connection with the opening or vacating of default judgments are considered infra § 337.

Proceeding for new trial distinguished. A proceeding for opening a judgment is not a proceeding for a new trial,[21] and is not governed by the same rules of court.[22] A statute authorizing a proceeding to obtain a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence and a statute providing for other relief, such as vacation, after judgment, ordinarily afford an alternative remedy.[23]

Plea or answer. Where a plaintiff relies on a judgment which is void or voidable, relief against it may be had by plea or answer.[24] Fraud in obtaining a judgment is available as an equitable defense.[25]

b. Motion or Petition in Cause

Subject to some exceptions, judgments may be opened or vacated, in most jurisdictions, on simple motion or petition in the cause.

In most jurisdictions, judgments may be opened or vacated on simple motion, or petition in the cause,[26] with exceptions, considered infra subdivisions c and d of this section, obtaining in some ju-

(2) "This remedy by motion is available in equity cases as well as those at law."—Freeman v. Wood, 88 N.W. 721, 11 N.D. 1, 7.

(3) A proceeding to set aside a final decree by a court of chancery, regular on its face and alleged to have been obtained by fraud, deceit, artifice or trickery, or other unlawful means, should be instituted by bill of complaint rather than a motion to set aside final decree and open up the case.—Sauer v. (2) Petition for relief against judgment irregularly or improperly obtained, although defect does not appear on record, is not technically statutory petition to set aside judgment, but is, in effect, motion for new trial.—J. S. Schofield's Sons Co. v. Vaughn, 150 S.E. 569, 40 Ga.App. 568—Grogan v. Deraney, 143 S.E. 912, 38 Ga.App. 237.

(4) Action intended as action for new trial would be treated as motion to set aside, as void, judgment in original action which was entered without consent or agreement of appellant and without statutory notice after expiration of statutory term of court.—Green v. In Pennsylvania

(1) Remedy of parties aggrieved by judgment regular on its face is by motion or petition to open judgment and not to strike it off.—Harr v. Bernheimer, 185 A. 857, 322 Pa. 412—Wilson v. Dooley, Com.Pl., 5 Sch.Reg. 174.

(2) A motion or petition to strike off a judgment may be regarded as a petition to open, if it is such in substance.—Curran v. James Regulator Co., 36 A.2d 187, 154 Pa.Super. 261—Scalatis & Calogeros v. Cargas, 10 Pa.Dist. & Co. 704, 40 Lanc.L.Rev. 623—Vogt Farm Meat Products Co. v. Sherman, 5 Pa.Dist. & Co. 609.

(3) Where a judgment is irregular on its face, the remedy is to strike it off the record and not a motion to open.—Sayers v. Redbank Tel. Co., 25 Pa.Dist. 655—Keyser v. Cardon, Com.Pl., 55 Montg.Co. 366—Jenkins v. Keystone Mut. Casualty Co., Com. Pl., 45 Lack.Jur. 88—Faust v. Gluck, Com.Pl., 6 Sch.Reg. 1.

(4) A rule to "strike off judgment" is essentially a common-law proceeding, a short and summary substitute for an audita querela, a writ of error coram vobis, or a certiorari or writ of error from a superior court by which the same relief was formerly administered, and, being for an irregularity on the face of the proceedings, it is in the nature of a demurrer to the record.—Hotel Redington v. Guffey, 25 A.2d 773, 148 Pa.Super. 502—Albert M. Greenfield & Co. v. Roberts, 5 A.2d 642, 135 Pa.Super. 328—Rome Sales & Service Station v. Finch, 183 A. 54, 120 Pa.Super. 402.

(5) Petitions to vacate and set aside are based on fatal defects apparent on the face of the record, while petitions to open concern other matters associated with the decree or judgment, or those on which the decree or judgment is based; where a judgment is being attacked for a matter of record, the proper motion is to strike off or vacate, which operates as a demurrer to the record. —Nixon v. Nixon, 198 A. 154, 329 Pa. 256—Strauch v. Miller, Com.Pl., 27 West.Co.L.J. 109.

(6) A rule to strike off a judgment is a common-law proceeding, raising questions of irregularity or insufficiency apparent on the face of the record; a rule to open judgment is an equitable proceeding; the two are not interchangeable, and, where the parties do not consent thereto, one cannot be substituted for the other by the court.—Hamborsky v. Magyar Presbyterian Church, 78 Pa. Super. 519—Faust v. Gluck, Com.Pl., 6 Sch.Reg. 1.

(7) A rule to strike off judgment is not a substitute for a rule for more specific statement of claim or a rule to strike off a pleading.—Hotel Redington v. Guffey, 25 A.2d 773, 148 Pa.Super. 502.

(8) Where defenses arise after the rendition of a judgment, the better practice now is to proceed by way of motion, or the parties may agree to the relief.—German Trust Co. of Davenport, Iowa, v. Plotke, 118 A. 508, 274 Pa. 483.

(9) Petition to open is the proper method to test validity of judgment entered on former scire facias.— Brusko v. Olshefski, 13 A.2d 916, 140 Pa.Super. 485—Miller Bros. v. Keenan, 90 Pa.Super. 470.

Elimination of defendant

Trial court's action in modifying judgment by eliminating therefrom one of the defendants on the ground that, at the time of signing the journal entry, court did not know that entry recited a judgment against such defendant constituted the vacation of a judgment irregularly obtained and proceeding therefor was properly by motion.—Goodkin v. In Illinois

(1) Under the statute abolishing the writ of error coram nobis and providing that errors of fact which could have been corrected by such writ may be corrected on motion by the court in which the error was committed, petition to vacate judgment under statute takes place of writ of error coram nobis at common law.—Josten Mfg. Co. v. Keeler, 2 N.E.2d 586, 284 Ill.App. 646.

(2) The courts of Illinois, although they refused to recognize the writ of error coram nobis, have encouraged the development of its statutory equivalent and have permitted its use in new situations wherever such was consonant with the history of its common-law antecedent, due to the tendency of the courts of law to apply equitable principles wherever necessary to prevent injustice; the Civil Practice Act has expanded the scope of the statute providing for motion in nature of writ of error coram nobis.—Nikola v. Campus Towers Apartment Bldg. Corporation, 25 N.E.2d 583, 303 Ill.App. 516.

(3) The motion under the statute is independent of the suit or proceeding in which the judgment sought to be corrected or vacated was rendered.—Central Bond & Mortgage Co. v. Roeser, 153 N.E. 732, 323 Ill. 90—Sherman & Ellis v. Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, 259 Ill.App. 453—Mitchell v. Eareckson, 250 Ill.App. 508—Marabia v. or opened on various other specific grounds.[33] On the other hand, it has been held that the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict cannot be attacked by a motion to vacate and set aside the judgment,[34] and that a final decree of partition cannot be opened by mere motion after the term.[35]

In some jurisdictions a judgment may be vacated on motion only when it is void or irregular on its face,[36] except pursuant to statutory provisions granting power to act on motion;[37] but in other jurisdictions this limitation does not prevail.[38] It has been held that an erroneous, as distinguished from an irregular, judgment cannot be set aside on motion.[39] A petition addressed to the court wherein the judgment was rendered, with rule nisi or process served on the necessary parties, has been deemed a proper form of procedure to vacate a judgment for defects not appearing on the face of the record.[40] A motion to set aside a judgment may not be made to perform the office of an appeal.[41]

While an action is pending to set aside a judgment, the same relief will not be granted on motion;[42] and, where an appeal is perfected before a motion is made to vacate, it has been held that the court has no power to vacate the judgment except on the ground of jurisdiction.[43]

During the term at which it was rendered, the court has inherent power to vacate the judgment on motion, on any ground appealing to the judicial discretion.[44]

A motion to set aside a verdict and judgment has been said to be distinguishable from,[45] and not to be subject to the same rules of practice as,[46] a motion to set aside a judgment only; and that it should also be distinguished from an independent suit in equity to set aside a verdict and judgment.[47] A petition to vacate a verdict and judgment for matters not appearing on the record has been held, in effect, a motion for a new trial.[48]

Petition as independent proceeding. A petition to vacate a judgment has been regarded, in at least one jurisdiction, as a new proceeding, separate from, and independent of, the action in which the judgment was entered,[49] and not as a supplemental step in the original cause.[50]

Interlocutory judgments or orders may always be vacated on motion in the cause made before the action is determined by final judgment.[51]

c. Action

It is variously held, with respect to particular grounds or circumstances, that an action, rather than a motion, is or is not the proper mode for seeking vacation of a judgment; some authorities permit the use of either.

In some jurisdictions the vacation of a judgment on certain grounds, or in certain circumstances, must be obtained by a direct action with appropriate pleadings, brought for the purpose of annulling such judgment, and cannot be obtained by mere motion.[52] Thus it has been held that the remedy is by plenary action, and not by motion, where vacation of the judgment is sought on any of the following grounds: Invalidity not apparent on the face of the record;[53] want of service of process, and of jurisdiction of the person;[54] fraud;[55] and accident or mistake.[56]

On the other hand, it has been held that the remedy by motion or petition in the cause is exclusive, and that an independent action will not lie,[57] at least not where based on certain grounds,[58] including irregularity,[59] failure to serve process,[60] the unauthorized appearance of an attorney,[61] the premature entry of judgment,[62] or the death of defendant before judgment.[63] The principle is that an independent action will not be allowed where the relief or remedy demanded may be had in an existing action.[64]

In some jurisdictions, the rule is that an independent action to vacate a judgment will lie where, without plaintiff's fault, the remedy by motion is not available, or adequate, but not otherwise.[65]

In some cases, it has been held that the remedy either by motion or by action is available.[66]

Lapse of time; rights of third persons

Without regard to whether or not relief may be had by motion or petition, a number of cases have held that relief may be had by action.[69]

d. Statutory Petition or Complaint and Summons

The statutory proceedings for vacating a judgment after the term, on specified grounds, by verified complaint or petition and summons are exclusive in some jurisdictions, but cumulative in others.

Under some statutes the proceedings to vacate or set aside a judgment in the court in which it was rendered, after the expiration of the term, on certain grounds therein enumerated, are by verified complaint or petition, and not by motion, and on such complaint or petition a summons or notice issues and is served, and other proceedings are had, substantially as in an action.[70] Such statutory proceeding, while incidental to the original action, has been declared, in effect, a new action,[71] equitable in character,[72] or an independent proceeding[73] or action,[74] or in the nature of an independent ac-

In Louisiana

(1) The action of nullity under Code Pract. art. 607 is independent of the remedy of appeal and is not a substitute for an appeal, its purpose being to furnish relief against fraud which has operated in the obtention of a judgment which makes no appearance in the record, and for which an appeal would afford no remedy.—Miller v. Rehearing under Alabama statute

The character of judgment within purview of statute authorizing application for rehearing within four months from rendition of judgment when a party has been prevented from making his defense by surprise, accident, mistake, or fraud, without fault on his part, is a judgment valid ex facia which on principles of equity and justice should not be allowed to stand.—Marshall County v. Critcher, 17 So.2d 540, 245 Ala. 357.

71. Kan.—State v. Soffietti, 136 P. 260, 90 Kan. 742.
34 C.J. p 323 note 2.

In Alabama

Rehearing under four-month statute is new proceeding, cumulative to remedy in equity, and sustainable on like grounds as to diligence required in presenting defense in original suit.—Craft v. Hirsh, 149 So. 683, 227 Ala. 257, appeal dismissed 54 S.Ct. 455, 291 U.S. 644, 78 L.Ed. 1041.

73. Ark.—United Order of Good Samaritans v. Bryant, 57 S.W.2d 399, 186 Ark. 960, certiorari denied 54 S.Ct. 59, 290 U.S. 641, 78 L.Ed. 557.

Filing application under title of original cause

If application to be relieved from judgment on ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect is filed under title of cause in which original judgment was entered, application will be treated as an independent proceeding.—Vail v. Department of Financial Institutions of Indiana, 17 N.E.2d 854, 106 Ind. App. 39.

74. Okl.—Thompson v. General Outdoor Advertising Co., 151 P.2d 379, 194 Okl. 300.

Docketing

(1) Such proceeding may be docketed as a separate action or as part of, and in connection with, original case in which the judgment sought

tion;[75] but it has also been said not to be in the nature of a new or independent action, but supplementary,[76] and not to be a civil action, but a special proceeding.[77]

Under some statutes, the statutory proceeding is an exclusive remedy, in cases where it is available, and a judgment cannot be vacated after the term in any other form of proceeding,[78] except by bill of review under equity practice.[79] Under other statutes, the statutory remedy is cumulative and not exclusive; it does not impair the remedies by motion or suit in equity which continue to be available in proper cases;[80] but an adverse decision in one form of proceeding will bar a subsequent resort to the other form of remedy.[81]

e. Waiver of Objections to Form of Remedy

Failure to object to the manner in which an application to vacate a judgment is made may be treated as a waiver of such objection.

Where the manner in which an application to vacate a judgment is made is not objected to at the time, it has been held that such objection will be considered waived and that it comes too late on appeal.[82] Thus, where no objection is made to the proceedings being by motion instead of by petition, the appellate court will consider the application as regular;[83] and the action of the court in setting aside a judgment on a petition instead of a motion will be considered a mere irregularity, and the irregular order will not be void for want of jurisdiction.[84] The irregularity of a motion instead of a formal complaint may likewise be waived.[85]

It has been held to be error for the court of its own motion, and without the consent of the parties, to treat a motion as an independent action;[86] but where, by mistake, a remedy is sought by independent action instead of motion in the original cause, the court may, in its discretion, treat the summons and complaint as a motion, to the end that the issues may be determined and the rights of the parties adjudicated.[87]

f. Indirect or Implied Vacation

A judgment may be in effect vacated by the taking of subsequent proceedings in the action which are inconsistent with its continuing in force. Authorities differ as to whether the entry of a second and different judgment in the case has this effect.

A judgment may be practically, or in effect, vacated, although not in terms set aside, by the taking of subsequent proceedings in the same action which are inconsistent with the judgment's continuing in force,[88] as by the entry of a second judgment in the case, different from the first,[89] although as to the last point there is authority to the contrary,[90] or, as appears in the C.J.S. title New Trial § 210, also 34 C.J. p 326 note 21, 46 C.J. p 436 notes 77–81, 84–85, by an order granting a new trial. The general rule, however, is that a judgment stands as such until it is expressly vacated in the manner prescribed by law.[91]

§ 287. —— Vacation on Court's Own Motion

A court may, on its own motion, vacate a judgment during the term at which it was rendered; and, if it is void, may do so at any time, even after the term.

Courts have been broadly said to be authorized to set aside or vacate their judgments on their own to be vacated was rendered.—Thompson v. General Outdoor Advertising Co., supra.

Setting aside to allow new trial

Trial court's order of its own motion setting aside judgment and order allowing appeal, for purpose of allowing motion for new trial, was held unauthorized and void.—Dougherty v. Manhattan Rubber Mfg. Co., 29 S.W.2d 126, 325 Mo. 656.

Nonpayment of fee

Under statute requiring collection of fee prior to entry of final judgment and court rule requiring deposit of judgment fee prior to taking of proofs, court could vacate judgment for defendant, which was entered without payment of fee, even if plaintiff had no right to move for vacation of judgment because of plaintiff's noncompliance with court rule.—Detroit Edison Co. v. Hartrick, 278 N.W. 664, 283 Mich. 502.

In Texas

(1) "The trial court has control of its judgments for a period of 30 days after the rendition thereof, and may set aside any judgment . . . on its own motion."—Christner v. Mayer, Civ.App., 123 S.W.2d 715, 718, error dismissed, judgment correct.

(2) Where plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled by operation of law for failure to present motion to trial court within thirty days after it was filed, judgment for defendant became final at the end of thirty-day period and trial court was without authority to set aside judgment either on strength of motion or on court's own motion, where term of court at which judgment was rendered had ended.—Aldridge v. General Mills, Civ.App., 188 S.W.2d 407.

(3) Where trial judge had jurisdiction to render judgment in first instance and judgment had been spread on minutes of court under judge's written instructions in form of an approved decree and had stood for five years without challenge, trial judge had no power to vacate the judgment on his own motion, merely because he had no recollection of having pronounced judgment from the bench; statutes empowering court to correct certain clerical errors and misrecitals in judgment after judgment has become final do not give court authority to vacate and set aside an entire judgment on court's own motion, where judge had directed clerk to enter such judgment.—Eskridge & Williams v. Merchants State Bank & Trust Co., Civ. App., 173 S.W.2d 518, error refused.

(4) Under Acts 38th Leg., 1923, c 105 § 1 subds 14–16, inclusive, requiring motions or amended motions for new trial to be determined within forty-five days after motion is filed, after filing of original motion, trial court had jurisdiction of case for at least forty-five days thereafter, during which time he could set aside his judgment without any motion and of his own accord.—Townes v. Dismissal

(1) Where a proceeding was dismissed by inadvertence or mistake, the court had a right on its own motion to set aside a judgment of dismissal, during the term at which it was rendered.—Hallam v. Finch, 195 N.W. 352, 197 Iowa 224.

Prompt action required

However, a statute permitting a trial court to set aside a verdict on its own motion, in certain circumstances, was held to contemplate prompt action by the court on the coming in of the verdict, so that the court could not, on its own motion, vacate a judgment eighty-three days after the verdict was returned.—Mountain States Implement Co. v. § 288. Time for Application

a. In general
b. Statutory provisions
c. Laches and delay
d. Irregular judgments
e. Fraudulent or collusive judgments

a. In General

An application for vacation of a judgment, invoking the court's inherent power and not made under statute, is generally not subject to statutory limitations of time; and under some authorities a void judgment, at least if void on its face, may be vacated at any time.

As appears infra subdivision b of this section, any statutory limitation of the time within which an application to open or vacate a judgment may be made must be observed in all applications to open or vacate made under, or within the operation of, the statute. Where, however, the application is not made under the statute, or on statutory grounds, but invokes the inherent power of the court, as discussed supra § 265, the statutory limitation is generally deemed not applicable[2] and the power to vacate in proper cases is not lost by mere lapse of time or expiration of the term.[3] Further, a void judgment may, under some authorities, be set aside or vacated at any time,[4] time not barring a motion

"A judgment which is void upon its face and requires only an inspection of the judgment roll to demonstrate its want of validity is a 'dead limb upon the judicial tree which may be lopped off at any time;' it can bear no fruit to the plaintiff, but is a constant menace to the defendant, and may be vacated by the court rendering it 'at any time on motion of a party or any person affected thereby,' either before or after the expiration of three years from the rendition of such void judgment. Such motion is unhampered by a limitation of time."—Grubb v. Fay State Bank of Fay, 249 P. 341, 119 Okl. 199.

Invalidity not appearing on face

(1) At common law, court's authority to vacate judgment not void on face of judgment roll, but void in fact for want of jurisdiction of person of defendant, ceased with ending of term at which judgment was entered.—Richert v. Benson Lumber Co., 34 P.2d 840, 139 Cal.App. 671.

(2) It has been held that a void judgment may be vacated on motion made within reasonable time where invalidity does not appear on judgment roll.—Savage v. Stokes, 28 P. 2d 900, 54 Idaho 109—Baldwin v. Anderson, 8 P.2d 461, 51 Idaho 614—Miller v. Prout, 197 P. 1023, 33 Idaho 709.

(3) In some jurisdictions, however, a judgment that is not void on its face can be attacked only within the time provided by statute.—Latimer v. Vanderslice, 62 P.2d 1197, 178 Okl. 501—Crowther v. Schoonover, 266 P. 777, 130 Okl. 249.

(1) Within this rule, a judgment is void on its face when its invalidity is apparent on inspection of judgment roll.

(2) Within this rule, a judgment is void on its face when the judgment roll affirmatively shows that the trial court lacked either jurisdiction over the person, jurisdiction over the subject matter, or judicial power to render the particular judgment.—Town of Watonga v. Crane Co., 114 P.2d 941, 189 Okl. 184.

(2) "It would be an absurdity to suppose that a person, against whom a judgment has been rendered without any service of process whatever, result of clerical mistake or inadvertence,[8] or because of irregularity by reason of mistake of fact,[9] or, as appears infra subdivision e of this section, because of fraud, deception, or collusion in obtaining the judgment, in all of which classes of cases the court has inherent power to vacate the judgment after expiration of the term, and without limitation as to time, unless a limitation is prescribed by statute,[10] and it has also been held that a judgment made through mistake may be vacated at any time.[11]

It has been said that ordinarily it is a litigant's duty to take steps during the term of court to set aside any unsatisfactory judgment.[12] The power to vacate a judgment because the court has changed its mind, and desires to change its ruling on the merits, expires with the term.[13] A premature motion will not be granted.[14]

Court rules. A motion to open or vacate a judgment may be denied where not made within the time prescribed by rule of court.[15]

b. Statutory Provisions

Statutory limitations on the time for making an application to open or vacate a judgment must be observed in all applications made under, or within the operation of, the statute.

Statutes in many jurisdictions expressly providing that a judgment may be set aside, opened, or vacated on grounds enumerated therein, and specifying the time within which the application shall be made, have been construed and applied in a number of cases.[16] Any statutory limitation of the

could be precluded by any lapse of time from contesting its validity. Even though he has become aware of its existence, there is no rule of law or of reason that requires him to take any action for its annulment. He may wait until it is sought to be enforced against him. This is a position so well settled that it would be useless to enlarge upon it, or to cite authorities in its support."—Harper v. Cunningham, 8 App.D.C. 430, 439.

Invalidity on face of record

(1) Judgment is not legally void for want of jurisdiction unless invalidity appears on face of record.—Dale v. Carson, 283 P. 1017, 141 Okl. 105—Carson v. Carson, 283 P. 1015, 141 Okl. 106—Savoy Oil Co. v. Emery, 277 P. 1029, 137 Okl. 67.

Purpose and application of rule

The district court rule fixing a period of six months within which a judgment might be vacated was adopted to take place of former rule requiring motions to vacate judgments to be noticed during terms at which they were rendered; by virtue of rule, judgments which formerly could not be set aside by a district court after expiration of terms at which they were rendered cannot now be set aside by motion noticed more than six months after they are rendered; rule does not apply to a judgment void on its face, or to separate or independent suits brought to set aside judgments; rule applies only to motions in the original case to vacate judgments.—Lauer v. Eighth Judicial District Court in and for Clark County, 140 P.2d 953, 62 Nev. 78.

In Alabama

(1) Under statute, circuit court has no power to open or set aside a final judgment or decree after the lapse of thirty days from the date of its rendition.—Maya Corporation v. Smith, 196 So. 125, 239 Ala. 470—First Nat. Bank v. Garrison, 180 So. 690, 235 Ala. 687.

(2) Under statute, a proceeding for rehearing must be initiated within four months from rendition of the judgment; otherwise jurisdiction of the court is not quickened into exercise, and the proceedings are void.—Marshall County v. Critcher, 17 So.2d 540, 245 Ala. 357—Venable v. Turner, 183 So. 644, 236 Ala. 433—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [a] (1).

(3) Other holdings under the Alabama statutes see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [a].

In California

(1) Under Code Civ.Proc. § 473, an application for relief against a judgment on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect must be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after the judgment was taken.—Hewins v. Walbeck, 141 P.2d 241, 60 Cal.App.2d 603—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (1), (6).

(2) Under the statute, now Code Civ.Proc. § 473a, when from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on defendant, the court may allow defendant, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action.—Richert v. Benson Lumber Co., 34 P.2d 840, 139 Cal.App. 671—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (2).

(3) It has been held that a court has no power to set aside on motion a judgment not void on its face unless the motion is made within a reasonable time.—Thompson v. Cook, 127 P.2d 909, 20 Cal.2d 564—Richert v. Benson Lumber Co., supra—F. E. Young Co. v. Fernstrom, 79 P.2d 1117, 31 Cal.App.2d Supp. 763—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (4).

(4) What constitutes a reasonable time depends on the circumstances of the particular case.—In re Dahnke's Estate and Guardianship, time within which an application to open or vacate a judgment may be made must be observed in all 222 P. 381, 64 Cal.App. 555—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (7).

(5) It has been declared to have been definitely determined that such time will not extend beyond the time fixed by Code Civ.Proc. § 473.—In re Andrews' Guardianship, 110 P.2d 399, 17 Cal.2d 500—Hall v. Imperial Water Co. No. 3, 251 P. 912, 200 Cal. 77—Thompson v. Thompson, 101 P.2d 160, 38 Cal.App.2d 377—Cikuth v. Loero, 57 P.2d 1009, 14 Cal. App.2d 32—In re Callaway's Guardianship, 26 P.2d 698, 135 Cal.App. 158—In re Dahnke's Estate and Guardianship, 222 P. 381, 64 Cal.App. 555.

(6) In determining what constitutes a reasonable time, by analogy to the statute, now Code Civ.Proc. § 473a, it has been held that the motion must be made within the year next following the entry of judgment, except in the case of bad faith on the part of the process server.—F. E. Young Co. v. Fernstrom, 79 P. 2d 1117, 31 Cal.App.2d Supp. 763—Richert v. Benson Lumber Co., 34 P.2d 840, 139 Cal.App. 671—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (5).

(7) To these rules, however, there is a well established exception which provides that, although the judgment is valid on its face, if the party in favor of whom the judgment runs admits facts showing its invalidity, or, without objection on his part, evidence is admitted which clearly shows the existence of such facts, it is the duty of the court to declare the judgment void.—Thompson v. Cook, 127 P.2d 909, 20 Cal.2d 564, prior opinion 120 P.2d 54.

(8) On the other hand, it has also been held that under certain circumstances the trial court has the inherent power, but not equivalent duty, to set aside its decrees after the expiration of the six-month period.—McCarthy v. McCarthy, 72 P.2d 255, 23 Cal.App.2d 151.

(9) A judgment void on its face is not within the statutory limitation and may be vacated on motion without regard to the lapse of time.—Michel v. Williams, 56 P.2d 546, 13 Cal.App.2d 198—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [b] (3).

(10) California legislation and decisions reviewed.—F. E. Young Co. v. Fernstrom, 79 P.2d 1117, 31 Cal.App. 2d Supp. 763—Richert v. Benson Lumber Co., 34 P.2d 840, 139 Cal. App. 671.

In Georgia

(1) Under Code § 8-702, proceedings to set aside judgments or decrees must be brought within three years from the rendition thereof.—Sewell v. Anderson, 30 S.E.2d 102, 197 Ga. 623—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [d] (1).

(2) Under Civ.Code, 1910, §§ 4358, 5957, 5958, judgment may be set aside within three years from rendition for any defect not amendable which appears on face of record.—Byers v. Byers, 154 S.E. 456, 41 Ga. App. 671.

(3) Single judgment for defendant on cross actions in bail trover and attachment cases by same plaintiff, tried together, was held voidable by plaintiff and his sureties on motion within three-year limitation period.—Pipkin v. Garrett, 162 S.E. 645, 44 Ga.App. 616.

(4) Affidavit that affiant had never seen decree, enforcement of which he sought to enjoin, until his property had been levied on and advertised for sale, or known thereof, was held not to prevent application of statute requiring motion to set aside decree to be made within three years.—Phillips v. Whelchel, 170 S.E. 480, 177 Ga. 489.

(5) Prior decisions see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [d].

In Idaho

(1) Court cannot set judgment aside on motion after statutory time for vacating it, which, under Comp. St. § 6726, as amended by L.1921, c 235, in cases where defendant was not personally served with process, is one year within entry of judgment, unless judgment is void on face of record.—Rice v. Rice, 267 P. 1076, 46 Idaho 418.

(2) Under Code, 1932, § 5-905, application to vacate judgment must be made within six months after adjournment of term whether movant moves on ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, or by reason of neglect or failure of movant's attorney to file or serve any paper within time limited therefor.—Roberts v. Wehe, 27 P.2d 964, 53 Idaho 783—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [g] (1).

(3) Other particulars of Idaho rules see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [g].

In Kentucky

(1) Jefferson circuit court is one of continuous session, and under statute has control over its judgments for sixty days; order of Jefferson circuit court of September 15, attempting to set aside decree of February 13, was erroneous for want of power to set aside order seven months after expiration of term during which it was entered.—Baumlisberger v. Dorman, 81 S.W.2d 876, 259 Ky. 37.

(2) Other decisions under the Kentucky statutes see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [j].

In Minnesota

(1) A motion to set aside a judgment for judicial error must be made within time limited to appeal since relief asked for would be same as that obtainable on appeal, but, where judgment is sought to be modified or vacated for good cause shown, the statutory limitation of one year after notice of entry of the judgment is applicable and, within the one year, the party seeking to vacate must act with diligence.—Holmes v. Conter, 295 N.W. 649, 209 Minn. 144—Alexander v. Hutchins, 197 N.W. 754, 158 Minn. 391—Alexander v. Hutchins, 197 N.W. 756, 158 Minn. 396.

In Missouri

(1) The motion permitted by statute, Mo.Rev.St.Annot. § 1267, providing that judgment shall not be set aside for irregularity on motion unless made within three years after term at which such judgment was rendered, is not an ordinary motion, within the usual meaning of that word, but is in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis, or an independent proceeding.—Poindexter v. Marshall, App., 198 S.W.2d 622—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [l] (1).

(2) The statute contemplates assault on an irregularity patent on record, and not one depending on proof dehors the record.—Crabtree v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 111 S.W.2d 103, 341 Mo. 1173—Buchholz v. Manzella, App., 158 S.W.2d 200—Stulz v. Lentin, 295 S.W. 487, 220 Mo.App. 840—34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [l] (2).

(3) Decree rendering judgment for improvement of two distinct projects was not responsive to petition for improvement of one project, and, therefore, irregular on its face, so as to come within statute.—Johnson v. Underwood, 24 S.W.2d 133, 324 Mo. 578.

(4) Other decisions under the Missouri statutes see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [l].

State, 129 P.2d 334, 45 N.M. 369—Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Wasson, 24 P.2d 1098, 37 N.M. 503, followed in Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Gardner, 24 P.2d 1104, 37 N.M. 514.

(2) A denied motion filed within statutory time, to vacate final judgment, cannot be refiled after such time and subsequent motion consid-applications to open or vacate made under, or with- / in the operation of, the statute.[17] This statutory ered as amended original motion.—Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Wasson, 24 P.2d 1098, 37 N.M. 503, followed in Board of Com'rs of Quay County v. Gardner, 24 P.2d 1104, 37 N.M. 514.

In New Jersey

(1) An interlocutory decree passes beyond the control of the chancery court one month after date thereof, but a final decree is for three months subject to reconsideration by chancery court.—Reilly v. Mahoney, 19 A.2d 887, 129 N.J.Eq. 599.

(2) A decree in partition suit confirming report of master, and adjudging that complainant had no interest in land and that defendants owned the whole of the land and ordering sale thereof was "final decree."—Reilly v. Mahoney, supra.

(3) Judgment of county court without its jurisdiction was void, and not mere irregularity, within statutory limitation of time on motions to vacate judgments for irregularity.—Kline v. Snyder, 231 N. Y.S. 275, 133 Misc. 128.

(4) Other decisions under New York statutes see 34 C.J. p 258 note 99 [m].

In Oklahoma

(1) If judgment is valid on its face, or if it is necessary to resort to intrinsic evidence to show its invalidity, motion or petition to vacate it must be presented within period, varying with nature of ground for vacation relied on, as provided for in successive statutes.—Honeycutt v. (3) Judgment rendered on notice by publication, requiring defendant to answer within forty-one days after date of first publication, is irregular and may be set aside on appeal or timely motion, but is not void on its face, and cannot be vacated on motion filed more than three years after rendition, under such statute.—Burns v. Pittsburg Mortg. Inv. Co., 231 P. 887, 105 Okl. 150.

In Oregon

(1) Under Code Civ.Proc. § 1-1007, the court may, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.—Haas v. Scott, 239 P. 202, 115 Or. 580.

(2) Fact that defendant's attorney had been informed on inquiry from deputy clerk that decree was not on file, although the record showed the contrary, was not surprise, mistake, or excusable neglect, within statute.—Haas v. Scott, supra.

In Texas

(1) Under statute, the trial court has control of its judgments for a period of thirty days after rendition thereof, and may set aside any judgment on motion filed, or on its own motion.—Christner v. Mayer, Civ. App., 123 S.W.2d 715, error dismissed, judgment correct—American Soda Fountain Co. v. Hairston, Civ.App., 69 S.W.2d 546.

(2) Where no motion for a new trial was filed before expiration of thirty days from the date of the judgment, such judgment became final and, if not void, could be set aside only by a bill of review and not by motion to set aside the judgment; a motion made after such thirty-day period to set aside judgment and for judgment non obstante veredicto was a collateral attack on judgment and court was unauthorized to set it aside unless it was void.—Bridgman v. Moore, 183 S.W. 2d 705, 143 Tex. 250.

power of the court over the judgment absolutely ceases on the expiration of such time, and thereafter it has no discretion, or even jurisdiction, to grant relief under the statute by opening or vacating the judgment.[18] A judgment, however, may be vacated on statutory grounds at any time within the time limited, by statute, either during or after the term at which it was rendered.[19]

Want of jurisdiction

24. In California

(1) Under Code Civ.Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him, provided the application therefor is made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken, the signing and filing of a formal order constitutes a "taking."—Brownell v. Yolo County Super. Ct., 109 P. 91, 157 Cal. 703.

(2) Court cannot by antedating order or entry of it cut off right of party to move to set aside judgment. —In re Harris, 52 P.2d 605, 10 Cal. App.2d 586.

Vacation after expiration of time for appeal

Where judgment was unauthorized because of plaintiff's failure to give defendant notice of application for order for judgment, rather than merely erroneous, it could be vacated, notwithstanding the time for appeal from the judgment expired before application for relief was made. —Kemerer v. State Farm Mut. Auto fact that a judgment does not include costs and disbursements does not have the effect of extending the statutory period.[26]

A statute extending the time limit cannot be given a retroactive effect so as to authorize the vacation of judgments which have become vested property rights by expiration of the time within which they could be vacated or modified;[27] but such statutes may apply to judgments previously rendered provided jurisdiction over them has not been lost.[28]

Statutory limitations of the time within which a motion for a new trial may be made have no application to motions to vacate the judgment,[29] because, as appears supra § 265, a motion to vacate a judgment is not a motion for a new trial.

Where the statute limits the time for applying for the vacation of a judgment, the moving party, to bring himself within its terms, must not only file his motion or petition within the prescribed time, but must also issue or serve such process or notice as may be necessary to bring the opposite party into court,[30] and present his case in a condition to be heard within the limited time.[31] When this has been done in due season, it has been held that the petition may be amended, or a new one substituted, after the expiration of the time,[32] or new parties added,[33] or the application continued for further hearing.[34]

Under some statutes it has been held that the relief must be granted as well as the application therefor made within the time prescribed by statute;[35] but under other statutes, if the motion was made within the limited time, it is competent for the court to act on it and grant the relief demanded although the time has expired before the order is made.[36]

c. Laches and Delay

An application for the opening or vacating of a judgment must be made with reasonable promptness, and delay amounting to laches will justify refusal of the application.

A party who has knowledge of the judgment against him is required to exercise reasonable diligence and promptness in seeking to have it opened, vacated, or set aside, and his unexcused delay in making the application, amounting to laches, will justify the court in refusing the relief asked,[37] es-

Laches as bar to equitable relief see infra § 381.

First opportunity

pecially where, under the circumstances of the particular case, the vacating of the judgment would work undue hardship to the opposing party,[38] or where rights of innocent third persons have intervened.[39] Even if the application is made within the statutory time, it will be regarded with disfavor, and may be refused, if there is unexplained delay in presenting it, or such unreasonable dilatoriness as amounts to laches;[40] but some cases hold that a party has the whole of the statutory period in which to move, and that laches cannot be imputed to him within that time,[41] and that delay within the term is immaterial.[42]

However great the lapse of time, laches is not imputable to a party who had no knowledge of the judgment against him; it is only required of him to be diligent in seeking relief after he has notice of it,[43] although it has also been held that a person asking that a judgment be set aside must show that he used diligence to learn the facts.[44] A person under legal disability is not chargeable with laches for failure to move during the period of disability,[45] but he must exercise reasonable diligence in moving to vacate after the removal of the disability.[46]

Laches is not mere lapse of time, but is unreasonable delay under the circumstances, generally involving injustice or injury to the opposite party,[47] and accordingly it is impossible to lay down a precise rule as to what lapse of time will constitute reasonable diligence, or what amounts to laches in moving to open or vacate a judgment; what is a reasonable time is a matter within the court's sound legal discretion,[48] and depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.[49]

ty embraces the first opportunity he has of presenting his case.—Assets Development Co. v. Wall, 119 A. 10, 97 N.J.Law 468.

Voidable judgment

If party knows judgment which was merely voidable was rendered against him, unexcused laches or delay generally precludes him from having it vacated.

Laches cannot run against a void judgment,[50] at least where no injury is shown,[51] and delay does not estop one from attacking a void or invalid judgment entered against him,[52] or a judgment which has been discharged in fact by accord and satisfaction.[53]

d. Irregular Judgments

Apart from statutory provisions as to time, which must be observed, a judgment will generally not be vacated after the term for mere irregularity not rendering it void; and an application to set aside a judgment for mere technical irregularities has been required to be made at the first opportunity or within a reasonable time.

Where it is sought to set aside a judgment for a mere technical irregularity, and not a matter of substance, the application, being without merits, has been required to be made at the first opportunity, or within a reasonable time, or the irregularity will be deemed waived.[54] This rule does not apply where the motion is based on substantial, and not merely technical, irregularities.[55] Application should be made to vacate before taking any subsequent step in the cause.[56]

Generally a judgment will not be vacated after the end of the term for any mere irregularity not affecting the jurisdiction, and therefore not rendering the judgment void,[57] unless the statute grants an extended time for moving to vacate it on this

Some cases hold that a motion to vacate for irregularity may be made at any time within a reasonable period.[60]

e. Fraudulent or Collusive Judgments

Under some authorities, an application under the court's inherent power to set aside a judgment obtained by fraud may be made at any time; others limit it to a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud. A statute limiting the time for applications on statutory grounds, unless expressly made applicable, does not apply to an application on the ground of fraud, at least where the fraud is extrinsic.

Under some authorities, the inherent power of courts to set aside or vacate a judgment obtained through fraud, deception, or collusion may be exercised at any time,[61] even after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered;[62] but it has also been held that an application to vacate must be made within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud,[63] and that laches is ground for denying relief.[64]

§ 289. Requisites and Sufficiency of Application

An application to open or vacate a judgment must conform to the ordinary requirements of a motion, petition, complaint, or bill, and must set forth facts showing adequate ground for the relief requested and freedom from fault or negligence.

An application to open or vacate a judgment must conform to the ordinary requirements of a motion, petition, complaint, or bill, according to the form of proceeding adopted.[68] Where applicant has erred as to his proper remedy and proceeding, the court may treat his application as in the proper form if it contains the matter and allegations required in the proper proceeding.[69] Where the application is under a statute, the provisions of the statute must be substantially complied with, in order to authorize the court to act,[70] but a strict compliance with the statute is unnecessary, trifling irregularities not being sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the court.[71] Harmless errors may be disregarded[72] and amendments may be allowed.[73]

A motion, petition, or complaint to vacate a judgment must state the nature of the cause of action on which it was rendered,[74] describe the judgment or portion of it sought to be opened or vacated,[75] show

The statutory provisions for setting aside judgments and orders on notice contemplate actual presentation of motions for such relief to trial judge in open court, and mere filing and service of notice of intention to make such motions is insufficient to give court jurisdiction to consider and determine them.—Milstein v. an interest in the judgment sufficient to entitle applicant to apply for its vacation,[76] show compliance with all preliminary requisites or conditions precedent,[77] contain an appropriate demand for relief,[78] and show a meritorious cause of action, or defense, available to applicant if the judgment is vacated, as discussed infra § 290. Unless prescribed by statute, no particular form or formula of words is necessary.[79] It is enough if the application shows a case for relief under the statute, or the inherent power of the court.[80] An application substantially in the language of the statute will generally be sufficient.[81] Ordinarily the application is required to be in writing,[82] unless made during the term at which the judgment was rendered, in which case a mere suggestion will suffice,[83] since at such time, as discussed supra § 287, the court may act on its own motion without any form of application. A statutory requirement of writing has been held to be directory only, and not mandatory.[84]

An application which is insufficient on its face is subject to demurrer;[85] but a demurrer is not necessary to authorize the court to dismiss such an application.[86]

Separate and distinct judgments may not be vacated on one and the same application.[87]

Grounds for relief. Facts constituting sufficient ground for vacating the judgment must be set forth in the application,[88] although it is sufficient if such

Compared to motion for new trial

A motion to open up the case after judgment requires virtually the same showing as for a motion for a new facts appear from affidavits contained in the motion papers instead of the petition or motion itself.[89] Facts as distinguished from conclusions of law must be stated.[90] It is not enough to allege "mistake," "surprise," "fraud," "unavoidable casualty or misfortune," or the like, in general terms; the very facts which led up to the taking of the judgment or which prevented the party from defending the suit must be stated explicitly.[91] An averment of the facts, without stating the legal conclusion to be drawn therefrom, is sufficient.[92]

Freedom from fault or negligence. The petition, complaint, or moving papers must show, not generally or inferentially, but by specific averments, that applicant has not been in fault, or that he has exercised due diligence and vigilance.[93] If a prima facie case of negligence appears, there must be a showing of facts excusing such negligence.[94]

Verification. Under a statute or court rule so providing, an application to vacate a judgment must be verified,[95] but such a statutory requirement has been held to be directory only, and not jurisdictional.[96]

§ 290. —— Meritorious Cause of Action or Defense in General

a. In general
b. Sufficiency of showing
c. Sufficiency of cause of action or defense

a. In General

Although there are some exceptions to the rule, an application to open or vacate a judgment generally must be supported by a showing of a meritorious cause of action or defense.

To obtain an order opening or vacating a judgment, the party applying therefor must generally allege and show to the court that he has a good and meritorious defense,[97] or, if the application is made by plaintiff, that he has a good and meritorious trial, and will not be granted unless petitioner shows that he was prevented from making the defense by surprise, accident, mistake, or fraud of his adversary, without fault on his part.—Estes v. Nell, 63 S.W. 724, 163 Mo. 387.

cause of action.[98] It must be made to appear that a retrial will result in a judgment different from the one sought to be vacated.[99] In the absence of such a showing, or where the contrary affirmatively appears, the judgment will not be opened or vacated.[1] Statutes regulating the proceedings sometimes expressly require such a showing of merits,[2] but, even under statutes not so providing, the courts generally impose such requirement in the exercise of their equitable discretion.[3] The reason for this rule is that if defendant has no valid defense, or plaintiff has no cause of action, as the case may be, so that a second trial must result in an identical judgment, then no actual injustice has been done, and it would be a vain and idle thing to disturb the judgment already entered.[4]

Exceptions to the rule have been made in a variety of cases.[5] It has been held that a judgment may be opened or vacated without the showing of a meritorious action or defense where the judgment is void,[6] as for want of jurisdiction,[7] although some cases hold that merits must be shown even in the case of a void judgment.[8] It has been held that, where the judgment was obtained by fraud, a meritorious defense or action need not be shown,[9] although in some jurisdictions merits must be shown in such case.[10] Where judgment was irregularly taken against a person under legal disabilities, such as an infant or an insane person, a showing of merits is not required,[11] but there is also authority to the contrary.[12] It has likewise been held that a meritorious action or defense need not be shown where the judgment was entered without authority, by mistake, or improvidently,[13] or where the ground of objection to the judgment is clearly well founded.[14] It has generally been held that the application need not show a meritorious defense or action where the application is made during the judgment term,[15] but the court, in its discretion, may impose such requirement.[16]

b. Sufficiency of Showing

The facts constituting the cause of action or defense must be set forth in an application to open or vacate a judgment; it is not sufficient to allege that the applicant has a meritorious cause of action or defense.

Where it is necessary to show merits, it is not sufficient to allege in general terms that defendant has a good or meritorious defense to the action, or that plaintiff has a good and sufficient cause of action;[17] the nature of the defense, or cause of action, must be shown.[18] The facts constituting the proposed defense, or claimed cause of action, must be set forth in detail, so that the court may judge whether or not it is meritorious and sufficient.[19] A statement of the facts is sufficient; it is not necessary to allege the legal conclusion that applicant has a meritorious defense or cause of action.[20] It has been held that an unverified declaration or complaint is not sufficient,[21] and that the facts must be stated positively, and not merely on information and belief.[22] Amendments to make a more adequate showing as to the meritorious action or defense may be allowed in furtherance of justice.[23]

c. Sufficiency of Cause of Action or Defense

To constitute a meritorious defense or cause of action in support of an application to open or vacate a judgment, the claim must be legally sufficient; it must not be merely technical, unjust, or inequitable.

A meritorious and substantial cause of action or defense must be shown in support of an application to open or vacate a judgment, that is, one which raises questions of law deserving investigation or a real controversy as to the essential facts.[24] Matter which would be a sufficient defense to an action is not necessarily a meritorious defense warranting the vacation of a judgment which has been entered;[25] a judgment will not be opened or vacated if the defense or cause of action is not meritorious, but is purely technical in its character, or is dishonest or unconscionable;[26] and the defense or

Capacity to contract
A judgment will not be opened on the ground that defendant was incapacitated by habitual drunkenness to make the contract sued on, where no fraud or imposition is charged, and the evidence does not show that he was entirely incapable of making a contract.—Spetz v. Howard, 23 Pa. Super. 420.

Compounding a felony
A judgment entered on a bond given to secure any indebtedness that might be found against the obligor by award of arbitrators will not be opened on the ground that it was given to compound a felony, where the evidence shows that there was no actual agreement not to prosecute, and that the obligor, although charged with a felony, did not actually commit it.—Woelfel v. Hammer, 28 A. 146, 159 Pa. 446.

Gambling contract
The fact that plaintiff's cause of action was based on a contract made in state for purchase of "punch cause of action must be such that the judgment in disregard of it is unjust and inequitable.[27]

§ 291. —— Proposed Answer

The requirement that an application for the opening or vacation of a default judgment be supported by a showing of the answer which defendant proposes to interpose is discussed infra § 336 e.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 292. Answer and Other Pleadings

An answer is required where the proceeding to open or vacate the judgment is by action, but not where it is by motion in the cause.

Where an application to open or vacate a judgment takes the form of a motion in the cause, it is governed by the rules applicable to motions generally, and no formal pleadings in opposition are required.[28] A like rule has been applied to a proceeding by complaint under a statute providing that the application may be by complaint or motion,[29] but in most jurisdictions, where the application is made by formal action, or petition, the usual rules of pleading are applicable, and the holder of the judgment must controvert the allegations of the petition or complaint by an answer.[30] The answer must raise an issue by direct and positive averments; if it fails to do so, the petition or complaint may be taken as confessed and the judgment set aside.[31] The answer is sometimes required to be verified.[32] The petition may be dismissed for failure to file a replication, if one would be required by the ordinary rules of pleading.[33]

A cross complaint seeking affirmative relief may not be interposed in opposition to an application to open or vacate a judgment.[34]

§ 293. Parties; Persons by and against Whom Proceedings May Be Brought

a. In General

Generally all the parties to a judgment should be joined in a proceeding to open or vacate the judgment.

Assignee of judgment
(1) On a proceeding to vacate a judgment, the assignee of the judgment is a necessary party and entitled to notice.—Robinson v. American Chemical Co., 9 N.Y.Civ.Proc. 78.

(2) Filing and recording assignment of judgment held not constructive notice to judgment debtors that assignee had become owner thereof, and thereby to oblige them to serve notice and make her a party in proceedings to set aside judgment and grant new trial, there being no statute pertaining to assignment of a judgment.—Miller v. Greenfield Sav. Bank, 203 N.W. 236, 199 Iowa 1039.

ally one not party to the judgment should not be joined.[37] A merely nominal party need not be joined.[38] Where a judgment against joint defendants is not deemed an entirety, codefendants are not necessary parties to an application by one defendant to vacate a judgment on grounds peculiar to himself,[39] such as lack of jurisdiction.[40] A codefendant against whom no relief is sought, and who will not be affected by an order vacating the judgment, need not be made a party to the motion.[41]

It has been held that where defendant seeks to avoid judgment on the ground that he was not duly served, and there is an entry of service purporting to have been made by a sheriff, he must traverse the return and make the officer a party to the proceeding.[42]

b. Who May Apply

An application to open or vacate a judgment may generally be made only by a party to the record who has been prejudicially affected; but in some cases one not a party who has been injured may apply.

The general rule is that an application to open or vacate a judgment can be made only by a party to the record[43] who in some way has been prejudicially affected by the judgment,[44] and that a stranger to the record who was neither a party nor a privy to the action cannot make such an application.[45] If it appears that the parties really in interest are content that the judgment shall stand and submit to the irregularities affecting its validity, it should not be set aside at the instance of a stranger,[46] and this is particularly true where he would not be benefited.[47]

46. N.Y.—Assets Realization Co. v. Howard, 127 N.Y.S. 798, 70 Misc. 651, affirmed 136 N.Y.S. 1130, 152 App.Div. 900.

This rule is, however, subject to the limitation that a person not a party may apply for the opening or vacation of the judgment where his rights are injuriously affected thereby.[48] Persons who, while not parties to the record, are the real parties in interest affected by the judgment stand in such relation to the judgment that they are entitled to move to set aside or vacate it.[49] Where the statute under which the proceeding is instituted specifies the persons entitled to relief, only persons within the statute may apply.[50] An application to vacate may be made by a receiver for a party,[51] by his trustee in bankruptcy,[52] by a garnishee,[53] by a surety for the principal debtor,[54] or by an indemnitor.[55] A subrogee has the necessary interest to procure the revocation of an order irregularly rescinding the decree by which he was subrogated.[56]

Persons who by reason of the filing of a lis pendens are bound to a judgment as though they were parties may move the court and be heard with reference to any judgment affecting their rights.[57] It has been held that a void judgment may be vacated and stricken from the record as a nullity at the instance of any person interested or affected thereby,[58] but a person whose interest was acquired after judgment cannot have the judgment vacated for irregularities of which the parties do not complain.[59]

Successful party. The courts have power in a proper case to open or set aside a judgment at the instance of the party in whose favor it was rendered, since, although nominally in his favor, it may be really prejudicial to him, or not so favorable as it should have been,[60] but a party cannot object to so much of a judgment as is clearly favorable to him although it is unauthorized,[61] or to a judgment in his favor rendered at his instance with knowledge of its irregularity.[62]

Rights directly and necessarily affected

Where the rights of one not a party to a judgment are directly and necessarily affected, he may intervene after judgment and have his rights protected.—Standard Oil Co. v. State, Tex.Civ.App., 132 S.W.2d 612, error dismissed, judgment correct.

Judgment procured by fraud

Exception to rule that direct attack may not be made on judgment by one not a party thereto exists where such judgment was procured by fraud and materially affects interest of person making the attack. —Turman Oil Co. v. Roberts, Tex. Civ.App., 96 S.W.2d 724, error refused.

Indian lands

Where lands are held by the Five Civilized Tribes under patents in fee with restraints on alienation, a decree undertaking the alienation of the Indians' interest in the lands in a suit to which the United States is not a party has no binding effect and the United States may sue to cancel the decree.—Town of Okemah, Okl., v. Joint defendants. A judgment against several defendants jointly, which is void or irregular as to one of them, may be vacated on the application of that defendant.[63] In such a case it is not necessary that the judgment should be vacated as to all the defendants if their liability is several as well as joint,[64] unless they are inseparably connected in interest,[65] except in those jurisdictions where a joint judgment is regarded as an entirety for all purposes.[66] One joint defendant cannot object to errors and irregularities affecting only his codefendants.[67]

Legal representatives. Under statutes regulating the opening or vacating of judgments which provide that an application for such relief may be made by the "legal representatives of the defendant," or by "any person legally representing him," an application may be made not only by the executor or administrator of a deceased defendant[68] and his widow and heirs,[69] but also one who by deed or other grant has acquired his entire interest in the subject matter of the action.[70] Even in the absence of such a statute, the executor or administrator of a deceased judgment debtor is not a stranger to the record and may move to vacate in proper cases.[71] Persons applying in this character for the vacation of the judgment must show a state of facts which would have supported the application if made by the original party.[72]

Creditors whose claims have not been reduced to judgment have been held to have no standing on an application to vacate a judgment against their debtor.[73]

Judgment creditors whose interests are affected may maintain an application to vacate a prior judgment against their debtor on the ground that such judgment is fraudulent as to them,[74] or wholly void for want of jurisdiction,[75] but mere irregularities not rendering the judgment void cannot be taken advantage of by subsequent judgment creditors.[76]

A subsequent purchaser of land, on which a judgment has become a lien, takes cum onere, and cannot maintain an application to vacate the judgment for irregularity,[77] although there is also authority to the contrary;[78] but a void judgment, as distinguished from one that is merely irregular,[79] or a judgment voidable as fraudulent,[80] may be vacated at the instance of a subsequent purchaser. A transferee pendente lite of all the interest of defendant becomes the real party in interest, and as such may apply to set aside the judgment.[81] An execution purchaser may have a fraudulent judgment vacated.[82]

gagor or lienor who was not a party, and whose rights are not affected by the judgment, cannot move to vacate it.[84]

"Unknown parties." Persons who are actually affected by a judgment by reason of having been made parties as "unknown" defendants may apply to have such judgment opened or vacated.[85]

§ 294. Notice or Process

An application to open or vacate a judgment is generally required to be on notice to the adverse parties, and, where the proceeding is by way of action, process must be served.

As a general rule an application to open or vacate a judgment must be on notice to the adverse parties,[86] particularly where the application is made after the expiration of the term.[87] It has been held that during the term at which a judgment is rendered it may be set aside for sufficient cause without notice to the party affected,[88] but there is also authority to the contrary.[89] Where the court would have been justified in setting the judgment aside on its own motion, want or insufficiency of notice has been held to be immaterial.[90] It has likewise been held that leave to withdraw a motion to vacate may be granted without notice to the adverse party,[91] and an order vacating a judgment may be set aside, and the judgment reinstated, without notice.[92] Notice may be waived by appearance or otherwise.[93]

Where the proceedings are by action, or by way of statutory petition or complaint and summons, a summons must be served;[94] but process need not be served where the proceeding is by motion in the original action.[95]

Sufficiency. A notice of motion to vacate should be in writing[96] and must be sufficiently full and explicit to advise the party of the nature of the proceeding, the judgment to be affected, and the grounds on which the motion will be based,[97] as well as the time and place of hearing.[98] A notice is sufficient when it informs the party entitled thereto of the thing which is to be done and leads him to the place of doing it at the proper time.[99] Statutes as to the time, form, and manner of notice must be observed.[1]

Service. Process must be served on the party, and service on his attorney is insufficient, where the proceeding to vacate is by action, or by statutory petition, or complaint, and summons.[2] Notice of motion may be served either on the party[3] or on his attorney of record,[4] but under some decisions service on the attorney is insufficient.[5] If the party is dead, notice must be served on his legal representative.[6]

Notice by publication. A motion to set aside a judgment is not such a proceeding as will authorize notice to the opposing party by publication pursuant to statutes providing for service by publication in actions,[7] but service by publication may be had in otherwise proper cases, where the proceeding is by way of action, or by statutory petition or complaint and summons.[8]

§ 295. Affidavits on Application

A motion to open or vacate a judgment should be supported by affidavits as to the facts on which the applicant relies.

A petition or motion to vacate a judgment should be verified or supported by affidavits as to the facts set forth,[9] except where the facts necessary to support the application appear on the face of the record,[10] or rest within the personal knowledge of the judge, where the application is made at the same term at which the judgment was rendered, and while the cause is still in fieri.[11] A copy of the affidavits should be served on the opposite party or his counsel,[12] but ordinarily the affidavits need not be filed until the hearing of the motion.[13]

Requisites and sufficiency. The affidavits in support of the application should show the existence and nature of the judgment sought to be set aside,[14] state the grounds on which relief is asked, not inferentially but directly, and not generally but specifically and in detail,[15] show the existence of a meritorious cause of action or defense, as discussed supra § 290, and show that applicant has not been negligent or lacking in due diligence, as discussed supra § 289. In all these particulars the affidavit is to be construed most strongly against the party

Nominal plaintiff as "adverse party"

Where a judgment is recovered by one person for the use of others in a proceeding to open the judgment where the statute requires notice to be given to the "adverse party," the notice need not be given to the nominal plaintiff, but it is sufficient to notify the usee.—Fitzgerald v. making it.[16] The affidavit must state the facts positively and directly; it is not sufficient to allege them on information and belief;[17] but affidavits made only on information and belief may serve to initiate the proceeding, since the defect is not jurisdictional and may be cured by subsequently filing amended or supplemental affidavits made on knowledge.[18] Substantial compliance with statutory requirements is sufficient.[19] Ordinarily the application should be supported by an affidavit made by the party himself, but the necessary affidavits may be made by the attorney, or other person, provided they are made on knowledge, instead of on information and belief, and a sufficient reason is shown why an affidavit is not made by the party.[20] An affidavit which fails to show why it was not made by the party has been held to be insufficient.[21] One of several defendants, having personal knowledge of the facts, may make the affidavit on behalf of all.[22] Affidavits used in the original suit, but not referred to, and not made part of the affidavits on the proceedings to vacate, cannot be considered.[23] An unsigned affidavit of the attorney presented with the motion papers may be treated by the court as a professional statement of counsel.[24] Matters of record should be shown by the record itself, or a transcript thereof, and not merely by affidavit.[25]

§ 296. Counter-Affidavits

Counter-affidavits, in opposition to opening or vacating the judgment, may be submitted.

The party seeking to sustain a judgment, as against a motion to set it aside, may present for the consideration of the court affidavits in opposition to those of the moving party, with regard to the alleged grounds for vacating the judgment or the matters set up in excuse of defendant's failure to make his defense in due time,[26] but the existence of a meritorious cause of action or defense, as shown by the moving party's affidavit of merits, cannot be controverted by counter-affidavits,[27] because, as discussed infra § 299, on the application to vacate the court does not try and determine whether or not a cause of action or defense exists in point of fact, but only whether such a prima facie case has been made as ought to be tried and determined in the regular way.

Counter-affidavits must set forth facts, and not merely matters of inference, conjecture, or belief.[28]

§ 297. Evidence

General rules of evidence apply in a proceeding to open or vacate a judgment.

The party who seeks to have a judgment opened or set aside must assume the burden of proving the facts essential to entitle him to the relief asked.[29]

General inferences and presumptions of fact apply in such proceedings.[30] On an inquiry of this kind presumptions will be indulged, requiring evidence to overcome them, of the regularity and validity of proceedings in the case anterior to judgment,[31] of the correctness of recitals in the record,[32] and of the jurisdiction of the court.[33] In a direct attack of this character all these presumptions are prima facie only, and may be contradicted by proof,[34] and it has been held that no presumption of regularity will be indulged in support of the judgment.[35] On the other hand, it has been held that the record cannot be impeached in a proceeding instituted at a subsequent term.[36] Where the application is by motion to strike, and such proceeding is available only to reach defects apparent on the face of the record, the record must be taken as true and matters outside the record cannot be considered.[37]

Admissibility. General rules govern as to the admissibility of evidence in a proceeding to open or vacate a judgment.[38] Evidence, in order to be admissible, must be competent, relevant, and material.[39] The evidence should be confined to the matters stated in applicant's moving papers.[40]

Weight and sufficiency. The facts on which the judgment is sought to be opened or vacated must be established by clear, strong, and satisfactory proof,[41] and this is especially true where it is nec-

Judgment or order of court of general jurisdiction should not be set aside merely on a statutory presumption, such as presumption of regular performance of official duty.—Burgess v. Lasby, 9 P.2d 164, 91 Mont. 482.

cant's own sworn statement alone may be sufficient to warrant opening the judgment.[46] Various circumstances may render opposing affidavits of unequal weight.[47] In case of a decided and irreconcilable conflict in the evidence for and against the motion, it has been held that the court must decide according to the fair preponderance of the evidence.[48] Thus, where there are opposing affidavits, but one party or the other is corroborated by circumstances, admissions, or evidence drawn from the record, the decision will be in his favor.[49] The court can act on knowledge of facts which occurred in open court without formal proof.[50]

Fraud or collusion must be clearly shown in order to authorize the vacation of a judgment on this ground;[51] a balanced case is not enough.[52] However, the requirement as to proof is less stringent where the application is made during the judgment term.[53]

Unauthorized appearance. While a judgment based on an unauthorized appearance by an attorney is generally voidable, and subject to be set aside on that ground, in order that a judgment may be vacated on such ground, want of authority on the part of the attorney must be clearly shown,[54] especially where innocent third persons have acquired rights under the judgment or decree sought to be set aside.[55]

§ 298. Status of Judgment Pending Application

An application to open or vacate a judgment does not suspend or stay the operation of the judgment.

The filing of a motion or petition to vacate a judgment does not suspend its operation, or prevent the issue and execution of final process on it.[56] On the contrary, some cases hold that such action admits the regularity of the judgment and waives any objections to it on that score,[57] but an application to vacate a void judgment does not make it effectual for any purpose.[58]

§ 299. Hearing and Determination in General

An application to open or vacate a judgment is to be disposed of on equitable principles. The parties are entitled to a hearing, and it is proper to determine the existence and sufficiency of alleged grounds for relief before considering whether a meritorious cause of action or defense exists.

The applicant for the opening or vacation of a judgment is entitled to a hearing;[59] on a contested application to open or vacate a judgment, the court should hear both parties and examine into all pertinent facts and circumstances,[60] and it is error to

As a general rule, the court will not open a judgment on the unsupported oath of defendant, where the testimony of plaintiff is directly contradictory; but where there is corroboration, or where there are circumstances on which corroborative inferences may be drawn in favor of defendant, the court ordinarily will open the judgment and submit the question in dispute to a jury.—Hotaling v. grant or dismiss the motion summarily or on an ex parte hearing, unless the question at issue is one which can be determined from an inspection of the record, or unless the facts are such as do not admit of dispute.[61]

Except where the statute gives a right to trial by jury, the issues of fact arising on a motion of this kind are triable by the court,[62] although it is within the power of the court in a proper case to award an issue to be tried by a jury,[63] or to order a reference,[64] or itself to proceed to take an accounting.[65] In conducting the investigation, the court possesses all the powers of a chancellor,[66] and it is its duty to weigh the evidence and determine the credibility of the witnesses.[67]

The application may be tried on affidavits or depositions where the proceeding is by motion or petition in the cause,[68] or by statutory complaint and summons,[69] although in the latter case it has been said that the trial should be on legal evidence, as in the case of an action, and not on affidavit.[70] If not satisfied with the affidavits, the court may require the parties to present oral evidence.[71] It has been held that, where the affidavits are in conflict, testimony must be taken,[72] but it has also been held that where the conflict is not likely to be resolved by the taking of testimony it is not necessary.[73]

The inquiry will generally be limited to the matters set up in support of the motion and in opposition to it.[74] Since, as discussed supra § 292, formal pleadings in opposition are often not required, an objection to the petition which has not been embodied in a pleading may nevertheless be urged at the hearing.[75]

A continuance or postponement of the hearing may be had at the discretion of the court because of the absence of a party[76] or to allow the filing of additional affidavits or the presentation of additional evidence.[77]

A proper and timely motion must be decided on its merits, and not simply stricken from the files.[78] The motion may be dismissed for want of jurisdiction if it appears that notice of it was not served on the party opposing,[79] or it may be withdrawn by the party presenting it,[80] or dismissed for his failure to appear at the hearing.[81]

Rules of decision. An application to open or vacate a judgment is an appeal to the equitable powers of the court,[82] addressed to the discretion of the court, as discussed infra § 300, and is to be disposed of on equitable principles so as to do justice to all persons concerned.[83] Generally the discretion will not be favorably exercised unless the enforcement of the judgment would be unjust, oppressive, or inequitable as to the moving party, who must be actually or prospectively injured or prejudiced by it,[84] and be benefited by its opening or vacation,[85] or unless the motion can be granted without material injustice or injury to the opposing party[86] or prejudice to the intervening rights of third persons.[87] It has been held that there is no fixed rule which determines whether an application to open or vacate a judgment will be granted, but that each case is to be

Application during judgment term
(1) Courts usually act liberally in those cases in which application to strike out a judgment is made during term in which judgment was entered.—Pioneer Oil Heat v. Brown, 16 A.2d 880, 179 Md. 155.

(2) Time for application see supra § 288.

Contempt
Judgment of contempt is not necessary to deny relief against court order, but relief will be denied if person stands in position of contemner.—Cooper v. Cooper, 143 A. 559, 103 N.J.Eq. 416.

Defect cured
Garnishee's motion to set aside judgment on ground of variance in name of plaintiff was properly stricken after judgment had been amended.—Merchants' Grocery Co. v Albany Hardware & Mill Supply Co., 160 S.E. 658, 44 Ga.App. 112.

Irregular judgment
Action of court in passing on application to set aside judgment, voidable for irregularity, is largely controlled by promptness with which application is made.—Fowler v. Fowler, 130 S.E. 315, 190 N.C. 536.

Petitions to vacate judgment are extraordinary in nature, and should be granted only after careful consideration, and where required to accomplish justice.—Russell v. Foley, 179 N.E. 619, 278 Mass. 145.

There should be finality and permanency to court decrees, which should not be vacated and set aside without careful consideration, but court should be slow to say that an injustice may not be corrected by such means.—In re Macior's Will, 52 N.Y.S.2d 389.

determined on its particular facts.[88] The application should be denied where the averments of the petition are denied and are not supported by proof.[89]

Grounds of application. A judgment should not be opened or vacated unless it is found that one of the statutory or other recognized grounds for such action exists.[90] It has generally been held that the court should limit its consideration to such grounds for opening or vacating the judgment as are set forth in the application,[91] but it has been held that the application should be granted where sufficient grounds appear of record, although not relied on by the party seeking relief.[92] The application should not be granted in any case where the relief to which the party is entitled can more appropriately be awarded in some other action or proceeding, as discussed supra § 283, or where another suit is pending between the same parties in which the court can grant all the relief or protection called for by the equities of the case.[93] After a motion for a new trial has been denied, a motion to vacate based on the same grounds is improper and will be denied.[94] It has generally been held, sometimes under statutes so providing, that it is proper for the court to try and determine the existence and sufficiency of the alleged grounds for opening or vacating the judgment before trying or deciding the existence of a meritorious cause of action or defense.[95] With respect to the grounds of relief, evidence will be heard on both sides.[96] Should the court find that the grounds relied on are not sufficient, or are not proved, it is unnecessary to go into the inquiry as to the validity of the defense.[97] However, both issues may be tried together where the parties waive the right to have them tried separately.[98]

Merits of cause of action or defense. Where a meritorious cause of action or defense is required, as discussed supra § 290, a judgment should not be opened or vacated until it is found and adjudged that there is a cause of action, or a defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered.[99] After it has been decided that the grounds of the application are sufficient, in order that the validity of the defense may be adjudged, an issue or issues may be made up and a trial had thereon.[1] The court is not to try and decide the merits of the proposed cause of action or defense,[2] but is only to

Purpose of rule

The discretionary nature of jurisdiction to vacate a decree is designed to prevent too ready unravelling of judgments, avoid putting a premium on continued litigation and promote considerateness of judicial decision. —W. E. Hedger Transp. Corp. v. Ira S. Bushey & Sons, C.C.A.N.Y., 155 F.2d 321.

Wholly discretionary or vacate the judgment is made at common law[7] or under statutory provisions.[8]

On the other hand, the court's discretion is not to be exercised arbitrarily, oppressively, or from mere caprice; it is a judicial discretion to be exercised in accordance with legal and equitable principles,[9] and should be so exercised as to promote the ends of justice.[10] The court's action must rest on competent evidence.[11] It is an abuse of discretion to open or vacate a judgment where the moving party shows absolutely no legal ground therefor, or offers no excuse for his own negligence or default,[12] or where the application is granted purely for the purpose of extending applicant's time to appeal.[13] If, however, applicant shows himself plainly and justly entitled to the relief demanded, the court must grant the application and it is an abuse of discretion to refuse it.[14] Under no circumstances will the court be justified in refusing to receive and hear a motion to vacate the judgment; its discretion is to be exercised on the facts as developed on a hearing, not in advance of it.[15]

§ 301. Relief Awarded

On an application to open or vacate a judgment, the court may generally grant such relief as is appropriate under the circumstances.

On an application to open or vacate a judgment, the court may award such relief as is appropriate under the circumstances.[16] It has been held that the court, on vacating a judgment, may set aside conclusions of law,[17] and that a judgment regularly entered on a verdict may not be vacated unless the verdict is also set aside;[18] but it has been held that on vacating a judgment the court is without power to make new findings inconsistent with those already made,[19] and that it may not, on opening or vacating a judgment against applicant, proceed to enter a judgment in his favor[20] where the parties have the right to a jury trial.[21] Either on opening or vacating the judgment, the relief granted may include the setting aside of an execution or a sale thereunder.[22] Where a court or judge is authorized to set aside or vacate a judgment, the jurisdiction includes the right to grant any less or incidental relief by which justice may be obtained and the rights of the parties may be protected.[23] Where justice can be done between the parties by amending or correcting the judgment, or reducing its amount, the court will be warranted in entering a new judgment in the proper form.[24] Under a special statutory motion to vacate a judgment and enter a different judgment based on the findings, it has been held that the court may not consider any facts except those included in the findings,[25] and that it may not change the findings of fact.[26] Under a statute so providing, the failure to determine the application within a specified time constitutes a denial of the application.[27]

A court having power to vacate a judgment entirely may grant less relief by vacating it in part only, where justice so requires.

A court having power to vacate a judgment entirely may grant less relief by vacating it in part only, where justice so requires.[28] Where one portion of the judgment is separable from the balance thereof, and the objection goes only to a separable part, the court should not set aside the whole judgment but only the objectionable part.[29] A motion to vacate the whole of a judgment is too broad, and may properly be overruled, if any separable portion of the judgment is free from objection.[30] A judgment against several persons may be set aside as to one or more of them, and allowed to stand as to the others,[31] except where a judgment is entire and indivisible, when, being irregular and erroneous as to a part of the defendants, it is of necessity so as to all and must be opened or vacated as to all.[32] A judgment may be opened or vacated with respect to a part of the amount of recovery,[33] except where the recovery is not apportionable,[34] or as to the recovery on one or more separate counts or causes of action united in the same suit.[35]

§ 303. —— Terms and Conditions

The court may generally impose reasonable terms and conditions on opening or vacating a judgment.

Where, as is generally the case, as considered supra § 300, the opening or vacation of the judgment is discretionary with the court, it is within the sound discretion of the court to impose, as a condition to granting the application, such terms as may be just and reasonable,[36] provided, of course, there are no statutory provisions to the contrary;[37] and the court's decision will not be disturbed except for abuse of discretion.[38] The imposition of terms, however, is not a necessary condition on opening the judgment; and the opposing party may not complain that terms were not imposed, unless he can also show that the action of the court was arbitrary and unjust.[39] The circumstances may be such that it would be an abuse of discretion to impose terms, and in such cases terms should not be imposed.[40] Where the opening or setting aside of the judgment is demandable as of right, it is not proper to impose any terms.[41] Where the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, terms may not be imposed as a condition to granting relief.[42] In any event, the discretion of the court with respect to imposing terms must be exercised in a reasonable manner.[43] Under some circumstances, a court may refuse to open a judgment on some condition to be performed by the successful party.[44] An order setting aside a judgment for plaintiff at his request should be conditioned on his remitting payments made on the judgment.[45] The court, on opening a judgment, may limit the issues to be determined.[46]

§ 304. Findings

In some jurisdictions, but not in others, the court is required to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in passing on an application to open or vacate a judgment.

In some jurisdictions, on an application to open or vacate a judgment, the trial court is required to find the facts separately from the conclusions of law, much as in the case of a special verdict, and to set them forth on the record;[47] in other jurisdictions findings are not required,[48] although it has been said that the court ought to file an opinion setting forth its findings of facts and the grounds of its decision.[49] Findings are unnecessary where the court exercises its plenary power and discretion to set aside a judgment at the same term at which it was rendered.[50] Where parties desire to insist on findings, they must request them.[51] Except where separate findings are required by statute, an order vacating a judgment is an implied finding of the facts necessary to support it.[52] Similarly a denial of the application is an implied finding that grounds for such relief do not exist.[53] The findings, if proper, have the same effect as a verdict.[54]

§ 305. Order

General rules as to orders apply to orders opening or vacating judgments.

An order opening or vacating a judgment must comply with the requirements of orders generally,[55] and also with any special statutory requirements.[56] The order must be the judicial act of the court[57] and should show clearly what disposition of the judgment the court intended to make.[58] The judgment affected must be described with sufficient accuracy to be identified,[59] but mere inaccuracy of description does not invalidate the order.[60] While it has been held that the order must recite the grounds for granting the application,[61] there is also authority to the contrary.[62] The order must be duly entered of record.[63]

§ 306. —— Operation and Effect in General

Where a judgment is vacated or set aside, it is as though no judgment had ever been entered; but a judgment which has been opened generally remains operative as security until the termination of the litigation.

Where a judgment is vacated or set aside by a valid order or judgment, it is entirely destroyed and the rights of the parties are left as though no such judgment had ever been entered.[64] No further steps can be legally taken to enforce the vacated judgment.[65] The action, however, is left still pend-

55. Ky.—Lovill v. Hatfield, 268 S.W. 807, 207 Ky. 142.

Order as judgment

An order vacating a judgment or an order for a judgment is not a judgment and does not determine an application to enter another and different judgment.—Prothero v. Superior Court of Orange County, 238 P. 357, 196 Cal. 439.

Improper caption and index

Where intent of order, made in term in which judgment was entered, to set aside judgment was unmistakable, court thereafter properly disregarded judgment notwithstanding order may have been improperly captioned and indexed.—City of Hazard v. Duff, 175 S.W.2d 357, 295 Ky. 701.

56. N.D.—Harris v. Hessin, 151 N. W. 4, 30 N.D. 33.
34 C.J. p 384 note 89.

Time of entry

Where the court's inherent power to open or vacate a judgment is limited to the judgment term, an order rendered under its inherent power is ineffective if rendered after the expiration of the judgment term.—Davis v. Oaks, 60 S.W.2d 922, 187 Ark. 501.

34 C.J. p 384 note 91.

Full relief

On a statutory proceeding to set aside a judgment as inconsistent with the findings and to enter a different judgment based on the findings, the court must grant full relief in one order; it cannot vacate the judgment in one order and leave the entry of a proper judgment for another order.—Stanton v. Superior Court within and for Los Angeles County, 261 P. 1001, 202 Cal. 478—34 C.J. p 376 note 17 [a].

Orders inconsistent with judgment

(1) Where, after judgment is entered, an order is made which is inconsistent with the continued operation of the judgment, as where a party is given leave to file a plea to the complaint, the effect of the order is to vacate the judgment.—Box v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 168 So. 216, 232 Ala. 1.

(2) The granting of defendant's motion to dismiss complaint after judgment had been entered in defendant's favor was equivalent to a "vacation of judgment," and defendant was thereafter precluded from relying on alleged finality of the judgment.—Ericson v. Slomer, C.C.A. Ill., 94 F.2d 437.

Erroneous order is operative and effective.—Hibben, Holiweg & Co. v. Western & Southern Life Ins. Co., 169 N.E. 693, 90 Ind.App. 683.

Denial of application

Judgment overruling defendant's motion to set aside judgment against him on ground that plaintiff had not filed a verified petition was in effect ruling that plaintiff did not have to verify petition.—Garrison v. Bradford Supply Co., 51 S.W.2d 254, 244 Ky. 430.

Partition

Where a partition, long before made, is set aside, the court in decreeing new partition will direct that former allotments be followed as far as justice will permit.—Oneal v. Stimson, 74 S.E. 413, 70 W.Va. 452.

Merits

In setting aside a judgment obtained by one party litigant on motion filed by other party at same term of court at which judgment was taken, the court would provide that action in setting aside judgment should not prejudice rights of the parties on a trial of the merits.—South Texas Life Ins. Co. v. Danhaus, Tex.Civ.App., 146 S.W.2d 1098.

ing and undetermined, and further proceeding may be had and taken therein.[66] The case stands again for trial or for such other disposition as may be appropriate to the situation.[67] It has been held that the effect of setting aside a judgment based on the verdict of a jury is to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial,[68] but it does not necessarily vacate prior interlocutory orders or judgments.[69] The vacation of a judgment vacates all proceedings taken under the judgment.[70] Where the judgment is vacated, the lien falls with the judgment, and cannot be made to attach to the judgment ultimately entered.[71] Where a judgment of which a transcript has been entered in another county is set aside, the judgment on the transcript falls with it.[72] It has been held that a vacated judgment affords no justification for acts done before the order of vacation,[73] except to mere ministerial officers,[74] and affords no bar to a new action.[75]

Generally the rights of third persons, such as purchasers in good faith who have relied on the judgment, will be saved so far as is consistent with the rights of the judgment debtor.[76] Where the judgment vacated is void, the rights of an intervening purchaser of the property affected will not be protected.[77] Where the judgment is voidable but not void, its vacation will not divest the title of third persons acquired under it in good faith for a valuable consideration.[78] One having acquired title under an irregular judgment will not be affected by proceedings to set it aside unless he is made a party thereto.[79]

Although it has been held that the effect of opening the judgment is to leave the case standing as though no judgment had ever been rendered,[80] it is generally held that a judgment which is opened, as distinguished from one which is vacated, does not lose its status as a judgment;[81] it does not determine any rights of the parties in the action, but subsists only for the purpose of security,[82] its lien remaining unimpaired.[83] Merely opening a judgment does not necessarily vacate prior interlocutory judgments, orders, or proceedings in the case except such as are dependent on the judgment.[84] If the party who obtains the opening of a judgment is afterward defeated in the action, the effect is to restore the original judgment to full force and finally conclude his rights in the premises;[85] if the defense is successful, the judgment is vacated.[86]

86. U.S.—Leonard v. St. Joseph Lead Co., C.C.A.Mo., 75 F.2d 390.
34 C.J. p 387 note 16.

Original judgment is superseded by new judgment where applicant is successful on motion to set aside judgment and enter a different judgment based on the findings.—Karsh v. Superior Court in and for Los ment does not give jurisdiction where none before existed or confer on the judgment any validity it did not originally possess.[87] A refusal to set aside a judgment alleged to be void for want of jurisdiction is not a conclusive determination that the judgment is valid.[88] An order erroneously awarding relief against a judgment is not void where the court had jurisdiction.[89]

Subsequent proceedings. It has been held that the order opening the judgment rather than a general practice act controls the subsequent pleadings in the action.[90] Unless the order otherwise provides, defendant on the opening of a judgment may interpose any defense,[91] including one not previously raised.[92] Where a judgment is opened generally, the burden is on plaintiff to prove his cause of action,[93]

Persons bound. An order granting or denying a motion to open or vacate a judgment is binding and conclusive on all parties to the application and on those in privity with them.[94]

Renewal of application. The remedy of a party aggrieved by the denial of a motion to open or vacate a judgment is by appeal,[95] and not by resort to independent proceedings to obtain the same relief,[96] although it has been held that a denial of relief on motion is no bar to an action on the same grounds for the same relief,[97] and particularly not to an action for the same relief but on different grounds.[98] While the decision on a motion to vacate or set aside a judgment is not in the strict sense res judicata,[99] it has been held that a plea of res judicata may be sustained where the second application is on the same grounds as the first,[1] and it is general rule of practice that a second application for the same purpose, based on the same grounds as the first, will not be entertained[2] without first obtaining leave of the court,[3] unless the order denying the motion is made without prejudice to its renewal[4] or is made in a manner too defective or imperfect to prevent a renewal.[5]

A second application to vacate a judgment founded on facts which were known or which should have been known to the applicant at the time of making the first application will not, as a rule, be considered,[6] although a refusal to vacate a judgment on one ground is no bar to an application to vacate it on other grounds.[7] If, however, the court is satisfied that there was excusable neglect in not bringing forward all the grounds in the first instance, leave may properly be granted to renew the application.[8] A new motion should always be entertained when based on new grounds, not covered by the former motion and not then known or available to the party.[9] Where leave to renew an application to vacate or set aside a judgment is granted, such second application must be in accordance with the terms imposed on granting such relief.[10] Where the second application is for different relief, as, for instance, where the former motion was to vacate a judgment as a nullity, and the second is to open such judgment and let applicant in to defend, or vice versa, the denial of the first motion is no bar as to the second.[11]

§ 307. —— Restitution

A party who has received benefits under a judgment which is vacated should be required to make restitution.

Where a final judgment is absolutely vacated, after it has been paid, or satisfied by execution or by possession of the property in controversy, the party benefiting by it should be ordered to make restitution,[12] but not where the judgment is merely opened to permit a defense; in the latter case there should be no order of restitution until after trial and final judgment.[13] An attorney who has shared in the proceeds of a vacated judgment may be ordered to make restitution.[14]

§ 308. Objections and Exceptions

Objections to defects in proceedings to open or vacate a judgment may be waived.

Defects or irregularities in the proceedings to vacate a judgment, or in the action of the court thereon, are waived if the party fails to object in due season, or shows his acquiescence by participating in the further proceedings in the action.[15]

§ 309. Vacation and Review of Order

An order opening or vacating a judgment may itself be vacated.

The court has power to reverse, correct, or modify orders made by it on an application to open or vacate a judgment.[16] An order opening or vacating a judgment may itself be vacated or rescinded,[17] as where the order was made without jurisdiction,[18] or was obtained irregularly or fraudulently,[19] or because it was erroneous,[20] or on failure to comply with the conditions imposed.[21]

An application to vacate an order vacating or opening a judgment must be timely made,[22] and due notice must be given.[23] It has been held that the application must be made to the judge who rendered the order sought to be vacated.[24]

The effect of vacating such an order is to restore the original judgment.[25] When this is done, provision should be made for saving the intervening rights of third persons.[26] The court may pro-

D. WRIT OF ERROR CORAM NOBIS

§ 311. In General

A writ of error coram nobis is a common-law writ used in a proper case to obtain a review and correction of a judgment by the court which rendered it. Although widely replaced by more convenient remedies, the writ still obtains in some jurisdictions.

A writ of error coram nobis, sometimes called a "writ of error coram vobis,"[28] is an ancient common-law writ,[29] used for the purpose of obtaining a review and correction of a judgment by the same court which rendered it, with respect to some error of fact affecting the validity and regularity of the judgment.[30] The writ has grown out of use and become substantially obsolete both in England and in this country,[31] the more convenient and sum-

Distinctions considered

(1) "It is called a writ of error coram nobis in King's Bench, because the record and proceedings are stated in the writ to remain 'before us'. It was a fiction of old English law that the King was supposed to preside in person in that court. In the Court of Common Pleas, where the king is not supposed to reside, the writ is called a writ of error coram vobis, because the record and proceedings are stated in the record to remain 'before you,' meaning the king's justices. . . . The difference referred only to the form appropriate to each court, neither of which exists in the United States, and as a result there is no difference between a writ of error coram nobis and a writ of error coram vobis in this country."—Baker v. mary remedy by motion having taken its place, either as a matter of practice or by express statutory provision,[32] although, of course, distinctions do exist between a motion to open or vacate a judgment, and proceedings on a writ of error coram nobis.[33]

The writ is still an available remedy, and is occasionally used,[34] except where it has been abolished by statute;[35] and in some jurisdictions the writ is expressly authorized by statute,[36] or is preserved by operation of a general constitutional provision retaining common-law remedies.[37] However, in modern practice the writ is not so comprehensive as at common law because of the existence of statutory remedies, such as motion to vacate, motion for new trial, and appeal.[38]

d. Errors of law

a. In General

Except as otherwise provided by statute, all courts of record exercising general original jurisdiction at common law have power to issue the writ. The writ is inappropriate in chancery proceedings.

A writ of error coram nobis will not ordinarily lie after affirmance of the judgment on writ of error or appeal;[39] nor will the writ lie after the dismissal of a certiorari for want of merits in the petition.[40] Where a petition for a writ is denied and a second petition is subsequently brought in the same court that court has jurisdiction to decide whether or not the denial of the first petition is res judicata.[41]

In what courts and proceedings. All courts of record exercising general original jurisdiction at common law have power to issue writs of error coram nobis, as part of their common-law jurisdiction,[42] except as otherwise provided by statute.[43] It has been held that, in courts exercising only appellate jurisdiction, the writ does not lie;[44] but there is authority to the contrary,[45] The extent of the power of other courts to entertain the writ depends on the statutes controlling their jurisdiction and practice.[46] In England the writ did not lie either in the house of lords,[47] or in the exchequer chamber,[48] but did lie in the king's bench and common pleas.[49]

Since the writ of error coram nobis, is a common-law writ, it is inappropriate in chancery proceedings.[50] A divorce decree cannot be reviewed by writ of error coram nobis.[51] As appears in Criminal Law § 1606, the writ may be available in criminal, as well as in civil, proceedings.

b. Other Adequate Remedies

The writ of error coram nobis will not lie where there is another adequate remedy.

The writ of error coram nobis will not lie where there is another adequate remedy,[52] as by motion to vacate the judgment,[53] which, as discussed supra § 311, is now widely substituted for the writ, or by motion for a new trial,[54] or by appeal.[55] As falling within this rule, it has been held that a writ of error coram nobis will not lie on any of the following grounds, namely: Defenses available at the trial;[56] accident and surprise;[57] verdict against evidence;[58] newly discovered evidence;[59] and other like matters.[60]

c. Errors of Fact

(1) In general
(2) Jurisdictional facts
(3) Disability or death
(4) Fraud, mistake, and clerical errors
(5) New or adjudicated facts

(1) In General

A writ of error coram nobis lies for an error of fact not apparent on the record, not attributable to the applicant's negligence, and which, if known by the court, would have prevented rendition of the judgment.

A writ of error coram nobis lies, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, for an error of fact,[61]

Reason for rule

In chancery the court may at any time, either by motion or by a nunc pro tunc order or by a motion in the nature of a bill of review, correct the record or make the decree or judgment speak the truth.—People v. Janssen, 263 Ill.App. 101.

Other remedy inadequate

Fact that motion to set aside judgment for irregularities patent on record and errors of fact calling for introduction of evidence dehors the record was filed within one year after rendition of judgment did not preclude substitution of coram nobis proceeding for writ of error, since writ of error proceeding would preclude establishment of errors of fact dehors the record.—Crabtree v. "Writ of error coram nobis" cannot be used to attack the verity of recitals in a judgment essential to its validity, but a recital that defendant had been duly notified could be attacked thereby, since such recital was not essential to validity of the judgment.—General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. 72. Iowa.—Coppock v. Reed, 178 N. W. 382, 189 Iowa 581, 10 A.L.R. 1407.

risdiction to proceed depends, the defect not appearing on the record, is ground for a writ of error coram nobis.

A mistake in regard to the existence of a fact on which jurisdiction to proceed depends and which defect does not appear on the face of the record is ground for a writ of error coram nobis.[73] However, where the jurisdictional defect appears on the record, the error in giving judgment without jurisdiction is one of law and not ground for this writ;[74] and similarly, if the court erroneously determines that the jurisdictional requirements have been met, such determination is not subject to review on error coram nobis.[75] The writ lies to obtain relief against a judgment rendered by the court without knowledge of the fact that there has been no process or notice,[76] or that there were such defects in the process[77] or in the service of the process[78] as to have prevented the rendition of the judgment had the fact been known to the court. The writ lies where a resident defendant was brought in by publication, or other form of substituted service, on the mistaken assumption that he was a nonresident of the state.[79]

Under the rule, as considered in the C.J.S. title Process § 100, also 50 C.J. p 574 note 94–p 575 note 7, that, after the term has ended in which the judgment was entered, the sheriff's return of service, on which jurisdiction of defendant depends, cannot be contradicted in the same suit, but is conclusive as between parties and privies, a writ of error coram nobis does not lie to vacate a judgment on the ground that, contrary to the sheriff's return, there was in fact no valid service,[80] unless such false return has been procured by the fraud of plaintiff;[81] but, where the sheriff's return is held not conclusive, it may be contradicted on error coram nobis.[82]

Where the rule prevails that a judgment based on an unauthorized appearance by attorney is conclusive, as discussed supra § 26, the authority of an attorney to enter defendant's appearance cannot be questioned on error coram nobis.[83] A mistake in assuming an appearance for "defendants" was an appearance for all defendants, including those not served, is ground for the writ to vacate the judgment as against those not served.[84]

(3) Disability or Death

The writ lies to correct a judgment where the fact of death or disability of a party was unknown to the court when judgment was rendered.

The writ of error coram nobis will lie to correct a judgment for or against a party under a disability which would have prevented the rendition thereof had the fact been known to the court.[85]

Infancy. A judgment for or against an infant on the assumption that he is an adult, since he did not appear by next friend or guardian ad litem as the case may be, is irregular, and the mistake is ground for relief on writ of error coram nobis.[86]

Insanity. It is generally stated that a judgment irregularly entered against an insane person may be corrected by a writ of error coram nobis,[87] although there is authority to the contrary.[88] If, however, the fact of insanity is known to the court at the entry of the judgment, the writ will not lie.[89]

Coverture. Where coverture is a disability rendering a judgment for or against a married woman irregular, as discussed in Husband and Wife § 389, the irregularity may be remedied by writ of error coram nobis.[90]

Death of party. Since a judgment for or against a party after his death is irregular and erroneous, as stated supra § 29, a writ of error coram nobis lies to correct it.[91]

(4) Fraud, Mistake, and Clerical Errors

There is a conflict among the authorities on whether the writ of error coram nobis will lie for fraud, accident, or mistake, preventing a party from presenting his defense. The writ lies to correct clerical errors or misprisions.

According to some authorities, a writ of error coram nobis will not lie for fraud,[92] or for accident or mistake,[93] whereby the party was prevented from presenting his defense; but there is also authority to the contrary.[94] Under some statutes, the writ will lie as for a material error of fact where applicant was prevented from making a defense through fraud, accident, mistake, or surprise, without fault on his part.[95] The writ has been held not to lie for alleged false testimony at the trial.[96]

Clerical errors. The writ of error coram nobis lies to correct clerical errors or misprisions.[97]

(5) New or Adjudicated Facts

A writ of error coram nobis may not be grounded on newly discovered evidence or newly arising facts after judgment, or on facts adjudicated on the trial.

Neither newly discovered evidence on the issues already heard and determined,[98] nor facts newly arising after judgment,[99] are ground for relief on error coram nobis. Facts which were in issue and adjudicated on the trial cannot be retried on writ of error coram nobis;[1] and this rule will be adhered to, even though it is shown that the party applying

a. In General

A writ of error coram nobis is in substance a new suit commenced to reverse a former judgment.

As will appear in the succeeding subdivisions of this section, proceedings to obtain a writ of error coram nobis are generally instituted by petition or motion, on notice to the adverse party, and, after the issuance of the writ, plaintiff makes a formal assignment of errors in the nature of a declaration, and to this assignment defendant may plead or demur; the issues resulting from the pleadings are thereafter tried, and judgment either revoking or affirming the original judgment is thereupon rendered. The proceeding is in substance a new suit commenced to reverse a former judgment.[4] The proceeding is not for irregularity, but for error,[5] and therefore is not governed by statutory provisions relating to vacation of judgments for irregularity.[6]

b. Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction of a writ of error coram nobis is exclusively in the court which rendered the judgment.

The court which rendered the judgment has exclusive jurisdiction of a writ of error coram nobis to vacate it.[7] The writ cannot be employed to re-

c. Limitations and Laches

Unless prescribed by statute, the time for prosecuting a writ of error coram nobis is not limited, but the relief may be barred by laches.

It has been held that there is no limitation of time within which a writ of error coram nobis lies[11] except where such a limitation is prescribed by statute.[12] Relief may be refused, however, on the ground of laches.[13] A statute of limitations applicable to writs of error generally does not apply to the writs of error coram nobis.[14] In some jurisdictions statutes limiting the time for prosecuting the remedy in analogous proceedings have been held applicable, such as motions for a new trial,[15] or the prosecution of a writ of review.[16]

d. Parties

Only a party or privy to the record may procure a writ of error coram nobis, and all those who may be affected by the vacating of the judgment should be joined.

A writ of error coram nobis can be procured only by one who is a party, or privy to the record, and who is prejudiced thereby,[17] and not by a stranger to the record.[18] It has been held that the petition must be brought in the names of all the parties against whom the judgment was given,[19] but there is authority holding that only those parties as to whom there was error of fact need be joined,[20] and it has also been held that only those who have rights against petitioner and who may be prejudiced by the vacating of the judgment are necessary parties.[21] Where a married woman is under the common-law disability, her husband must join in the application.[22]

e. Application

Ordinarily notice of the application for a writ of error coram nobis must be given to the opposing party. The application must set forth with certainty and particularity the errors or defects on which it is based.

Notice of the application must be given to the opposing party or to his attorney,[23] unless sufficient reason for omitting notice is made to appear,[24] or unless notice is waived.[25]

Moving papers. The proper mode of proceeding is by petition or motion,[26] in writing,[27] setting forth with certainty and particularity the errors or defects complained of;[28] but the want of such allegations may be cured by failure of the adverse party to move for a dismissal.[29] If the petition is insufficient, advantage may be taken of the defect by motion to dismiss,[30] made at any time,[31] unless the right to do so is waived.[32] A motion to dismiss admits the allegations of the petition.[33] A petition or motion must be accompanied by an affidavit showing the occasion therefor.[34] A petition may be amended but, in allowing it, the court will exercise great caution.[35] The papers on the application should not be entitled in any suit.[36]

Bond. Petitioner must comply with a statutory provision requiring a bond to be given at the time of the filing of the petition.[37]

f. Allowance and Issuance of Writ and Supersedeas

The granting of the writ of error coram nobis depends on a showing of cause and is generally held to be a matter of discretion, not of right; and the granting of a supersedeas is likewise discretionary.

While it has been held that a writ of error coram nobis is a writ of right,[38] it usually has been held that it is not a writ of right but is granted only on a showing of cause,[39] and even then it is in the court's discretion whether or not, on the affidavits presented, to allow the writ.[40] However, if the circumstances warrant the allowance of the writ, relief should not be denied on immaterial grounds.[41] At common law, the trial of the sufficiency of the petition was preliminary to the trial on the assignment of errors, and was independent of it,[42] but in some jurisdictions the two are now blended together.[43] On an application for the writ, the fact assigned is not decided by the court definitively;[44] nor will the court look at the cause of action on which the judgment was recovered.[45] The fact that applicant acted with palpable dishonesty and bad faith is not ground for its refusal.[46] If, on an application for such a writ, plaintiff elects to vacate the judgment,[47] or if the writ will avail nothing,[48] the application will be denied. It must appear with reasonable certainty that there has been some error in fact, before the writ will be allowed.[49]

Although the writ issues on an order of the court allowing it,[50] it is necessary to obtain something more than a mere rule that writ of error issue.[51] The usual rule in such cases is that a writ of error in the nature of error coram nobis be allowed.[52] In practice, however, the actual issuance of the writ is a fiction, as the writ never issues,[53] the writ being presumed to issue on the fiat of the judge.[54] In some states the writ issues in the name of the people and is directed to the supreme court.[55] The writ coram nobis properly commands, "that the record and proceedings remaining before you being inspected, you cause further to be done," etc.,[56] and it must assign errors.[57]

will be quashed,[58] and a scire facias issued on the writ on the ground that the adverse party is dead must be directed to the adverse party's legal representative.[59] The writ is not made returnable, as it is merely in the nature of a commission to the court to examine the record and rectify the error.[60] While it is usual to have the allowance of such a writ indorsed thereon by the clerk in open court, it is not indispensable to the regularity of the writ.[61] If it appears that a party is entitled to the writ and will be remediless if the writ is quashed because of an irregularity in the issuance, the writ will be allowed as of the time it was filed, nunc pro tunc.[62]

While the writ did not of itself operate as a supersedeas,[63] at common law execution could not be taken out after the issuance of the writ without leave of court.[64] If an applicant wishes a stay he should make that a part of a motion for the allowance of the writ, stating the facts on which the stay is asked.[65] While a supersedeas may be granted ex parte without notice,[66] whether a supersedeas shall issue depends on the discretion of the court.[67] In general, the stay will be ordered only on put ting in and justifying bail.[68] Where there are several applicants for the writ of error coram nobis and a supersedeas, the supersedeas may be retained as to some of the applicants and dismissed as to the others.[69]

g. Pleadings

After a writ of error coram nobis is allowed, the applicant makes a formal assignment of errors in the nature of a declaration, to which defendant may either plead or demur.

The writ being allowed, applicant makes a formal assignment of errors in the nature of a declaration,[70] which should be verified,[71] stating the errors in fact on which he relies.[72] Errors in fact and in law cannot be assigned together.[73] The grounds set forth in the petition must be the basis of the issue presented in the more formal assignment of errors.[74] The assignment of errors having been filed, the rules of pleading in actions at law obtain.[75]

Pleadings in defense. Defendant may either plead or demur to the assignment of errors.[76] A demurrer admits the facts assigned as error.[77] The common plea is in nulla est erratum,[78] which is in the nature of a demurrer[79] and admits the fact to be as alleged, but insists that in law it is not error.[80] If the assignment of errors embraces the reasons for the application as well as the grounds for the revocation of the judgment, a general demurrer to the assignment is good if the reasons are insufficient.[81] If defendant would deny the truth of the error in fact assigned, he must traverse it by plea and take issue thereon,[82] or, if the case requires it, he may plead specially matter in confession and avoidance,[83] such as a statutory limitation.[84]

Reply. A plea of new matter in avoidance may be met by a reply or demurrer as the circumstances may demand.[85]

h. Evidence

Presumptions are in favor of rather than against the validity of the judgment; evidence dehors the record is admissible.

Any presumptions that are indulged on the hearing must be in favor of the validity of the judgment rather than against it.[86] The petition is not evidence,[87] although sworn to,[88] as its office is merely to point out the errors of fact on which relief is sought.[89] The record in the original cause becomes a part of the proceedings, without being made so by the petition.[90] Since, as discussed supra § 312 c, the office of the writ is to make apparent to the court some error of fact not apparent on the face of the record and which was unknown to the court, evidence dehors the record may be admitted,[91] but the general rule is that the record may not be directly contradicted.[92] General rules are applicable in determining the sufficiency of the evidence.[93]

i. Trial, Judgment, and Costs

If the pleadings in proceedings on a writ of error coram nobis result in an issue of fact, such issue must be tried, and judgment rendered in accordance with its determination; costs are within the discretion of the court.

If the pleadings result in an issue of fact, such issue must be tried[94] by a jury.[95] Issues of law are tried by the court.[96] The writ does not open up the whole case for a new trial, but only those points and questions raised by the application for it.[97] In some states the matter must be tried at the first term; otherwise defendant may move to discharge the supersedeas on denying on oath the facts stated in the petition.[98]

Judgment. The judgment on a writ of error coram nobis is that the judgment complained of be recalled, revoked, and annulled, if the issue is found in favor of petitioner,[99] whereupon the original suit is placed in the same position as it was when the judgment was rendered.[1] If the original judgment has been satisfied, the court cannot order that the money be refunded, but only that the judgment be vacated and annulled.[2] The judgment complained of is affirmed if the issue is found in favor of defendant in error.[3] In some jurisdictions if the trial court dismisses the writ, it may affirm the main judgment with a statutory penalty.[4]

Costs. Unless otherwise provided by statute,[5] costs are discretionary with the court.[6]

E. ACTION TO REVIEW JUDGMENT

§ 314. In General
- a. General principles
- b. Presentation and reservation of error at trial, and bill of exceptions
- c. Election of remedies

a. General Principles

Under some statutes an action to review a judgment may be maintained in the court which rendered the judgment.

Under some statutes, as in Indiana, an action may be maintained on specified grounds to review a judgment in the same court which rendered the judgment.[7] This statutory action is modeled after a bill of review in equity,[8] and is in the nature of a petition for a rehearing[9] and necessarily involves the merits of the original cause.[10] It is not strictly an independent action,[11] but is a continuation of the original action[12] and incidental to it.[13] The object of the action is to set aside the judgment and obtain a new trial,[14] but the proceeding is to be distinguished from a motion for a new trial,[15] and from an appeal,[16] although an action to review for error of law at the trial is in the nature of an appeal[17] and is governed largely by the same rules of procedure.[18] A void judgment may be attacked by a statutory action to review it;[19] but the action to review is to be distinguished from an action to vacate a judgment for invalidity; the latter is an independent proceeding not governed by the statute.[20]

b. Presentation and Reservation of Error at Trial, and Bill of Exceptions

An error of law, in order to be the basis of an action to review, must, unless waived, be presented to the trial court by proper and timely objection and exception; and unless the error is apparent on the record it must be incorporated in a bill of exceptions.

An error of law not presented to the trial court cannot be made the basis of an action to review the judgment.[21] In order to reserve questions for such review, objections must be made at the trial of the original cause,[22] exceptions reserved to the court's rulings,[23] and the errors assigned made the ground of a motion for a new trial,[24] and exceptions reserved to the court's ruling thereon.[25]

Objections to a judgment must be presented either by a motion to modify or correct the judgment[26] or by a motion to set the judgment aside,[27] and exceptions must be taken to the court's ruling on the motion.[28] The sufficiency of a complaint may be presented without having been demurred to, in the original action.[29]

Waiver of error. Ordinarily failure to except to the ruling of the court amounts to a waiver of the error.[30] Where, however, the failure to except does not amount to a waiver,[31] as where the court is without jurisdiction of the subject matter,[32] or where the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction of the person,[33] or where the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,[34] exceptions are not necessary.

Bill of exceptions. In order to make proceedings, which are not properly of record, apparent of record, they must be incorporated in a bill of exceptions,[35] filed within the time limited.[36]

c. Election of Remedies

The complaining party may appeal from the judgment to an appellate court or he may maintain the statutory action to review the judgment in the same court in which it was rendered.

The statutory action to review is not an exclusive remedy.[37] The complaining party to a judgment may appeal from the judgment in the original action to an appellate court for an error of law or bring an action, under the statute, to review the judgment in the same court,[38] but he must elect between the two courses; he cannot pursue both remedies.[39]

§ 315. Grounds of Action and Judgments Reviewable

The statutory action will lie to review all judgments, at law or in equity, with certain exceptions, on the ground of error of law on the face of the record or because of newly discovered material matter.

All judgments, at law or in equity, are reviewable by this statutory action,[40] except judgments in criminal actions,[41] judgments concerning decedents' estates,[42] and, by the express provisions of statute, judgments in divorce actions.[43]

The statutory action lies for error of law,[44] available on appeal,[45] apparent on the face of the record.[46] It will not lie because a witness committed perjury at the prevailing party's solicitation in the trial of the cause;[47] nor will it lie to review the act of a clerical or ministerial officer after the rendition of the judgment.[48]

The action will lie for material new matter discovered since the rendition of the judgment,[49] provided it could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence before the rendition of the judgment,[50] and provided it is such new matter of fact that, if presented in the original action, the complaining party would have been entitled to a different judgment.[51] An action to review for new matter discovered after the rendition of the orig-

Changed conditions since rendition of judgment, in that judgments were fully paid and that there was no one to whom money might be paid if collected, do not entitle defendant to a review of judgment, where judgments were paid by sureties on order of court, and who therefore had right to be subrogated to all rights of creditors whom they had paid, including their right to judgment for damages:—Trust & Savings Bank of Rensselaer v. Brusnahan, 147 N.E. 168, 88 Ind.App. 257, rehearing denied Trust & Savings Bank of Rensselaer v. Brusham, 148 N.E. 427, 88 Ind.App. 257.

Matter already in issue
Newly-discovered evidence will not justify a review of judgment, where at most it concerns matter al-

inal judgment is of a different character from an action to review for error committed at the trial[52] and is much like a coram nobis proceeding.[53]

§ 316. Jurisdiction and Procedure Generally

A statutory action to review a judgment may be brought only in the court which rendered the judgment. The complaint may be filed only by a party to the judgment, or one claiming under or representing him; it must be filed within the time fixed by the statute, and notice thereof must be given to the defendant.

The statutory action to review a judgment may be brought only in the court which rendered the judgment.[54] Under the statute the complaint to review may be filed without leave of court;[55] but defendant must be notified of the filing.[56] The filing of a complaint for review does not of itself stay proceedings on the original judgment,[57] but at any time after the filing of the complaint and before the final hearing the court may on the application of plaintiff stay all further proceedings on the judgment, and direct that bond be given as in cases of appeal.[58]

Limitations of time. The action to review must be brought within the time fixed by the statute[59] in force at the time of the institution of the action to review,[60] and with reasonable promptness within such time.[61] A person under a legal disability, however, is excepted from the operation of the statute for a fixed period of time after the disability is removed.[62]

Parties. Under the express provisions of the statute, the complaint may be filed only by a party to the judgment sought to be reviewed, or by the heirs, devisees, or personal representatives of a deceased party,[63] and ordinarily all the parties who were in the original proceeding should be before the court,[64] either as complainants or defendants in accordance with their respective interests in the matter to be reviewed.[65]

§ 317. Pleading and Evidence

a. Complaint
b. Pleadings in defense
c. Evidence

a. Complaint

A complaint in an action to review must be sufficient without resorting to the record. If based on error of law, the complaint must set forth the errors relied on, and show that objections and exceptions were duly taken and reserved; if based on new matter, it must allege all the elements of this ground for review.

An action to review a judgment is commenced by a complaint,[66] which stands on the same footing as the complaint in other actions,[67] and which must be sufficient without resorting to the exhibits.[68] A complaint stating a cause of action in general terms will be good, after verdict, as against a motion in arrest of judgment.[69] A complaint is not bad on demurrer for want of facts, if otherwise sufficient, merely because it fails to show that the suit was commenced within the time limited by the statute,[70] unless the complaint shows on its face ready in issue, and if introduced would not have produced different result.—Trust & Savings Bank of Rensselaer v. Brusnahan, 147 N.E. 168, 88 Ind.App. 257, rehearing denied Trust & Savings Bank of Rensselaer v. Brushaham, 148 N.E. 427, 88 Ind.App. 257.

Setting forth original pleading

The complaint should contain enough of the pleading in the cause, or the substance or nature or character thereof, to present the question of the alleged error without resorting to the transcript of the record, filed as an exhibit.—Clark v. Clark, supra—Jamison v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co., 48 N.E. 223, 149 Ind. 521.

that it is barred by lapse of time.[71] A complaint to review a judgment which is insufficient will not be held good as an application to be relieved from a judgment on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.[72] Leave to amend the complaint may be granted in a proper case.[73]

In action for error of law. If the action is based on an error of law, the complaint must set forth the errors relied on[74] and show that objections and exceptions to the errors alleged were duly taken and reserved in the original proceedings;[75] but this rule does not apply where the error is one which is not waived by a failure to except,[76] as where the complaint does not state any cause of action,[77] or where the court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter.[78] The complaint should itself set forth a complete record of the case,[79] or as much thereof as is necessary fully to present the errors complained of,[80] either by embodying it in the complaint or by referring to and identifying it as an exhibit so as to become substantially a part of the complaint;[81] but it is not necessary that the copy of the record set forth in the complaint should be a certified copy.[82] A bill of exceptions, even though a part of the record, is not such a written instrument as may be filed as an exhibit with the complaint.[83]

In action for new matter. When the complaint is based on material new matter discovered after the rendition of the judgment, it must set forth the character of the action,[84] the facts discovered since the rendition of the judgment,[85] the materiality of the new matter,[86] plaintiff's ignorance of it at the time of the trial,[87] the fact that the new matter could not have been discovered before the judgment by the exercise of reasonable diligence,[88] and that the complaint was filed without delay after the discovery.[89] The complaint must be verified by complainant.[90] The pleadings and evidence in the original case and the newly discovered evidence may be filed with the complaint as an exhibit,[91] but the affidavit of the witness by whom the new matter is expected to be established is not required to be filed with the complaint.[92]

b. Pleadings in Defense

The defendant may demur to the complaint, interpose a general or special denial, or plead proper affirmative defenses.

Defendant may demur to the complaint for its failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,[93] or he may interpose a general or special denial,[94] or he may plead proper affirmative defenses,[95] such as would have been available on appeal,[96] or he may plead the pendency of an appeal.[97] However, he cannot make any defense which was available in the original action.[98] for new matter, the plaintiff must prove the averment of material new matter.

In an action to review for error of law the question must be determined by the record itself,[99] and the recitals of the record will control, and cannot be contradicted by, the allegations of the complaint.[1] In an action to review a judgment for new matter plaintiff must prove the averment of material new matter,[2] and that it could not have been discovered by proper diligence.[3]

The hearing in a statutory action to review is by the court, as an appellate court, and it may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment.

In an action to review a judgment for an error of law, the hearing is by the court[4] which sits as an appellate court.[5] No right to a jury in such an action exists,[6] and the application should be determined on the principles governing motions for a new trial.[7] The judgment being reviewed will not be disturbed because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the court, or the verdict of the jury, if there is any evidence legally tending to support the finding or the verdict.[8]

Judgment. Under the statute the court may reverse or affirm the judgment in whole or in part, or modify it as the justice of the case may require,[9] the same as on an appeal to an appellate court;[10] but it has been held that a substantial error requires reversal of the judgment and that it is not necessary to show substantial error plus great injustice.[11] Leave to amend the pleadings in the original case cannot be granted.[12]

At least in the absence of an appeal, a judgment for or against a review of a former judgment puts an end to the action for review,[13] unless, on the overruling of a demurrer to the complaint, leave is granted to answer over.[14] If the judgment is against the review, the whole proceedings are at an end.[15] A judgment of reversal reverses and sets aside the judgment in the original action, leaving the action to proceed as though no trial had taken place;[16] and, moreover, a judgment of reversal will not bar another suit for the same cause of action.[17] A judgment of affirmance bars a second action to review the same judgment.[18]

§ 319. Review and Costs

An appeal may be taken from the judgment in an action to review, and costs may be awarded according to the rules for awarding costs on appeal in general.

An appeal lies from the judgment in an action to review,[19] provided the party had a right to appeal from the judgment in the original action when he filed his complaint for review.[20] The appeal lies to the same court to which an appeal from the original judgment lies.[21] The determination of an action for relief from a judgment taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect does not bar the right of another party to the main action to have the judgment reviewed for error.[22]

Costs. Under the statute the court may award costs according to the rule prescribed for the awarding of costs on an appeal.[23]

F. CONFESSED JUDGMENTS

§ 320. Amendment

A judgment by confession may be amended to correct mistakes or omissions, but an invalid judgment may not be amended.

A judgment by confession, like other judgments, as discussed supra § 236, may be amended by rectifying mistakes, correcting the form of the judgment, or supplying omissions,[24] but an invalid judgment may not be amended.[25] The court has no authority at a subsequent term to substitute a judgment on nil dicit for a judgment by confession, on the ground that the latter was entered by mistake.[26] Generally it is not necessary to join in the proceeding to amend the judgment creditors or persons subsequently acquiring interests in the property affected.[27]

§ 321. Opening and Vacating

b. Who may apply

c. Time for application

a. In General

Proceedings to open or vacate a judgment by confession must be in accordance with the requirements of statutes and court rules.

Proceedings to open or vacate a judgment by confession must be in accordance with the requirements of statutes and court rules.[28] As a general rule an application to open or set aside a judgment by confession should be made by petition or motion in the cause.[29] In some jurisdictions the vacation of a judgment may be secured on certain grounds, such as fraud on creditors, by action,[30] and it has been held that, if the confession and judgment are regular, they may be impeached only by a suit in equity on the ground of fraud.[31] It has been held that an application to open a judgment by confession, is, or is in the nature of, an equitable proceeding,[32] and that a motion or petition to open judg-

Procedure to open or vacate judgment generally see supra § 286.

Purpose of rule

(1) The purpose of the court rules governing motions to open a judgment by confession is to regulate and prescribe the procedure whereby a court may determine whether or not a defense exists, and to prevent frivolous defenses and defeat attempt to use formal pleadings as a means to delay the recovery of just demands.—Kirchner v. Boris & Dave Goldenhersh, 42 N.E.2d 953, 315 Ill. App. 305.

(2) The rule requiring a defendant to be summoned, and to show cause why a judgment by confession under power in note should be vacated, opened, or modified, provides a means to inform judgment debtor of the judgment and affords him an opportunity to move that it be vacated, opened, or modified.—Foland v. Hoffman, Md., 47 A.2d 62.

Notice of application

(1) Formal notice to plaintiff of defendant's motion and of the court's action in granting defendant leave to plead is not required, where he had actual notice thereof.—Rock Falls First Nat. Bank v. Deneen, 196 Ill. App. 427.

(2) Issuance of rule to show cause why judgment by confession should not be opened may be waived, and plaintiff in judgment may appear by counsel without service of writ, or service may be had in usual way.—Chandler v. Miles, 193 A. 576, 8 W.W.Harr.,Del., 431.

(3) Order setting aside order denying motion to vacate judgments by confession, without notice to movant or showing that first order was improvidently made or fraudulently obtained, was void.—Vale v. Maryland Casualty Co., 281 P. 1058, 101 Cal.App. 599.

Fraud

A general allegation of fraud is insufficient; the facts constituting the fraud must be set forth.—Potter Title & Trust Co. v. Vance Engineer-held that the motion or petition and the affidavits in support thereof must state positively, and not by way of inference or belief, the facts on which applicant relies.[41] The affidavits should be closely scrutinized, and be construed most strongly against the party making the motion.[42]

Mere defects or irregularities in a petition are amendable,[43] and the filing of an amended petition averring additional facts may be permitted where such facts do not constitute a new ground for the opening of the judgment.[44]

A petition or motion to open or vacate a judgment by confession is subject to attack by demurrer or motion to dismiss where it is insufficient on its face.[45]

The answer to an application to open a judgment by confession is subject to much the same pleading requirements as an answer to a bill in equity.[46]

b. Who May Apply

An application to open or vacate a judgment by confession may be made by the defendant, his personal representatives, a judgment creditor of the defendant, or, in some jurisdictions, by a general creditor of the defendant.

An application to vacate or set aside a judgment by confession may be made by the debtor or defendant himself,[47] or his executors or administrators,[48] or, in the case of a dissolved corporation, by its receiver.[49] A judgment against two or more defendants may be opened on the application of only one of them;[50] and, where such application is made at the term when the judgment is entered, it may be continued, and the other debtors be joined by amendment.[51]

A judgment by confession may be vacated or set aside, for good cause shown, on an application by other judgment creditors of defendant,[52] or by an attaching creditor,[53] or, it has been held, by any general creditor of the judgment defendant;[54] but it has also been held that only a judgment creditor has the right to move to set aside a judgment by confession.[55] A judgment confessed by several defendants will not be set aside on the motion of a creditor who has recovered judgment against some only of the defendants,[56] and a judgment, although defective, will not be set aside on a motion of a creditor whose judgment is subject to the same objection.[57]

Facts as to which affiant competent to testify

An affidavit in support of a motion to vacate a judgment by confession must be made on personal knowledge of affiant and must consist only of such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and it must affirmatively appear from affidavit that if affiant were sworn as a witness he could testify competently thereto.—Barkhausen v. tor's consent or knowledge may be vacated on his motion.[58]

A judgment by confession may be vacated or set aside for good cause shown at the instance of a bona fide purchaser or claimant of property on which the judgment is an apparent lien,[59] or by others whose rights or interests are affected by the judgment,[60] but it has been held that one who is not a party to the record may not apply to set aside the judgment for irregularities in entering it.[61]

The court may, in a proper case, act on its own motion.[62]

c. Time for Application

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, as a general rule there is no limitation of time for exercising the equitable power of the court to open or set aside a confessed judgment, although an application to open or set aside such a judgment may be denied where the defendant has been guilty of laches.

As a general rule there is no limitation of time for exercising the equitable power of the court to open or set aside a confessed judgment,[63] except when a limitation is fixed by statute,[64] and except that, where the application is made after such unreasonable delay on defendant's part as to make him chargeable with laches, it is viewed with great disfavor, and ordinarily will not be granted[65] unless a sufficient excuse for the delay is shown.[66] Laches, however, is not necessarily a bar to the

Defective statement of confession
Motion to set aside confession judgment on ground of defective statement of confession was not subject to one-year statute of limitations applicable to motions to set aside judgments for irregularities, since defective statement of confession was not a mere "irregularity."—Johnston v. opening or setting aside of a confessed judgment,[67] particularly where the rights of third persons have not intervened;[68] and laches will not bar the application where the judgment is void.[69]

During or subsequent to term. A judgment by confession may be opened or vacated on motion during the term at which it was entered,[70] and in the absence of a statutory limitation to the contrary, or of circumstances constituting laches, it may be opened after the end of such term,[71] such as at a subsequent term,[72] unless, under some statutes, the party has in the meantime unsuccessfully prosecuted another remedy against the judgment.[73]

§ 322. —— Jurisdiction and Authority

The court has equitable jurisdiction and power to open or vacate a judgment by confession.

While a judgment by confession operates as a release or waiver of formal errors and irregularities, as discussed supra § 169, nevertheless the judgment confessed remains within the control of the court,[74] and it may exercise an equitable jurisdiction over a judgment entered in this way, and has power to open, vacate, or set aside the judgment for good cause shown.[75]

Inherent power

The superior court in entertaining application to open judgment by confession under warrant of attorney exercises jurisdiction because of inherent power over its own records, and not under statutory authority.—Chandler v. (2) Order opening judgment confessed under warrant of attorney is proper, although rule to open such judgment had been discharged at previous term of court.—Johnson v. Nippert, 133 A. 150, 286 Pa. 175.

Power to control execution

The trial court had power to control judgment by confession and any execution issued thereon.—Keystone Bank of Spangler, Pa., v. Booth, 6 A.

§ 323. —— Grounds

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a confessed judgment will be opened or vacated only where some equitable ground or reason therefor is shown.

An application to open or vacate a judgment ordinarily is addressed to the equitable power of the court,[76] and, except where other grounds are specified by statute,[77] the judgment will be opened or vacated only where some equitable ground or reason therefor is shown.[78] A judgment by confession will not be opened or vacated for mere technical errors or irregularities.[79]

A judgment by confession may, in the discretion of the court, be opened or vacated on the following grounds: A failure substantially to comply with material requirements of the statute or rule authorizing such judgments;[80] forgery of defendant's signature to the confession or warrant of attorney;[81] that his name was never signed by him or by anyone authorized to sign it for him;[82] that the power to confess judgment was void;[83] that the attorney who assumed to appear for him and confess the judgment had no authority to do so, or acted beyond the scope of his authority;[84] that there was

The trial court was authorized to open revived judgment by confession to such extent as might be necessary to do justice between the parties, and to continue it as to the balance.—Keystone Bank of Spangler, Pa., v. Booth, 6 A.2d 417, 334 Pa. 545.

Mortgage foreclosure

Under statute authorizing recovery of deficiency existing after mortgage foreclosure sale, obligors on mortgage bond who executed warrant of attorney to enter judgment by confession waived the commencement of suit for deficiency by process and were not entitled to set aside judgment for deficiency entered by confession on bond and warrant, notwithstanding statutory provision that obligor may file an answer in suit on the bond.—Chambers v. a material alteration in the judgment note;[85] that a joint judgment was entered on separate warrants;[86] that judgment was not entered in favor of the proper party plaintiff;[87] that plaintiff has broken an agreement with defendant as to entering up or enforcing the judgment;[88] or that defendant had died before entry of the judgment.[89] It has been held that it is not a ground for opening or setting aside the judgment that it was in violation of an injunction issuing from another court.[90]

Time of entering judgment. A judgment by confession will not be opened or vacated on the mere ground that it was taken prematurely,[91] such as before the maturity of the obligation secured,[92] unless it is entered under a warrant of attorney which authorizes a confession only after maturity.[93]

Objections to affidavit or statement. Mere defects or irregularities in the affidavit or statement of the indebtedness required by the statute constitute no ground for vacating or setting aside the judgment;[94] although even in such a case some of the decisions hold that the judgment should not be set aside where no fraud or injustice is shown, and the debt is admitted to be due, unless some equitable ground is shown for the court's interposition,[95] but this relief may be granted where the affidavit or statement is wholly lacking or entirely insufficient.[96] It has been held that before a judgment, confessed under a warrant of attorney which is over a year and a day old, will be set aside because an affidavit is not filed showing that defendant was alive and that the debt was due and unpaid, the party making the application must show in addition some equitable reason therefor.[97]

Defects in pleading or evidence. A judgment by confession cannot be set aside because of immaterial defects in the pleadings or evidence in the case[98] or because of immaterial variances,[99] but it may be vacated for want of proof of the execution of the power of attorney by defendant,[1] or where the petition for judgment does not state facts necessary to give jurisdiction.[2]

Agent
Where lease provided that certain person who signed lease as agent, was acting as agent, failure to enter judgment by confession in lease in favor of such person, as well as in favor of admitted lessors was not ground for striking off judgment, since it sufficiently appeared, in absence of contrary averment, that such person had no other status than that of agent.—Forgeng v. Objection available to creditor only
A motion to vacate a judgment by confession on ground of alleged deficiency in statement of confession was properly denied, since alleged deficiency was not available to judgment debtor, statute relating to such judgment being intended only to protect creditors of a defendant from judgments entered on confession by collusion.—Magalhaes v. Fraud. A confessed judgment may be vacated on a sufficient showing that it was obtained by means of fraud, deception, or imposition practiced on defendant,[3] although it has been held that the judgment will not be vacated on such ground where the evidence in support of the petition to vacate shows that defendant has no defense to the action.[4] Where a judgment is confessed directly to a third party, who takes the same in good faith and for value, it cannot be impeached for fraud existing between the other parties;[5] but it is otherwise if such third party takes such judgment as collateral security only after it has been confessed.[6] Where there is no evidence of fraud or undue influence, it is no ground for setting aside the judgment that defendant is of weak understanding and in the habit of making improvident bargains,[7] that he is illiterate,[8] or that he was intoxicated at the time,[9] or that defendant did not know that his note contained authority for confession of judgment.[10]

Fraud or collusion between the original parties to the judgment will be cause for setting it aside at the instance of other creditors, as discussed in Fraudulent Conveyances § 44 b, or other parties in interest;[11] but not at the instance of defendant or the other original party.[12]

Duress. A judgment by confession may be set aside where it was obtained by duress.[13] A judgment will not be set aside for duress, however, where it is confessed in the presence of the court;[14] nor is the mere fact that defendant makes the confession while under arrest sufficient ground for setting aside the judgment, where it is shown that it was his voluntary act.[15]

Objection to amount of judgment. A judgment by confession may be opened or set aside where the amount of it is excessive.[16] The fact, however, that the judgment includes costs is no ground for setting it aside, if they are reasonable in amount;[17] and the mere fact that the judgment was confessed for less than the amount apparently due is no ground for setting it aside on the motion of defendant.[18] Where a judgment for less than authorized is confessed under a warrant of attorney, it has been held that an amended judgment thereafter entered for the proper sum is voidable and that it may be opened.[19]

Distinction between grounds for striking and opening judgment. A distinction is made, in some ju-

It can be stricken off or vacated, on petition or motion, only for an irregularity appearing on the face of the record.[20] If it has been regularly entered, and defendant is entitled to relief, such relief must come through a motion or petition to open it and let defendant into a defense;[21] and in such a case it cannot be stricken off on motion.[22]

§ 324. —— Meritorious Defenses

Unless the judgment by confession is void, a meritorious defense to the claim on which it was entered must be shown to warrant its opening or vacation, and the showing of a meritorious defense is in itself sufficient to warrant such relief.

It has generally been held that the fact that defendant has a meritorious defense to the claim for which judgment by confession was entered is in itself a sufficient ground for opening or vacating the judgment.[23] Moreover, unless the judgment by

Denial of motion to strike

Defendant whose motion to strike off judgment, entered by warrant of attorney, for irregularity on face of record was denied, was not precluded from presenting defense to judgment on petition to open judgment.—Rome Sales & Service Station v. Finch, 183 A. 54, 120 Pa. Super. 402.

Waiver of irregularities in entry

(1) Party moving to open judgment and to be let into defense on merits waives irregularities in entry of judgment, which might have been attacked by motion to strike off.—Rome Sales & Service Station v. (2) Irregularity in entering joint judgment on separate warrants of attorney to confess judgment is not waived by filing petition to open.—Peoples Nat. Bank of Reynoldsville, to Use of Mottern, v. D. & M. Coal Co., 187 A. 452, 124 Pa.Super. 21.

Opening not mandatory

Since, as discussed infra § 326, the opening of such a judgment rests largely in the discretion of the court, a judgment need not be opened merely because testimony offered by defendant would, if true, constitute a defense.—St. Clair Savings & Trust Co., for Use of Billhartz, v. confession is void, it will not be opened or vacated for a defect or irregularity therein unless it is shown that defendant has a meritorious defense to the claim for which the judgment was entered.[24] If no meritorious defense is shown and it appears to the court that an action on the debt or claim ought to go against the moving party, a judgment by confession will not be disturbed.[25] Where, however, a judgment by confession is entirely void, the court may vacate it without regard to the question whether defendant has a good defense to the claim on which it was based.[26]

The proposed defense must be meritorious; it must raise questions of law deserving investigation or a real controversy as to the essential facts.[27] The judgment may be opened or set aside on a

It has been held that the judgment may be opened to permit defendant to interpose a counterclaim or set-off,[36] unless the counterclaim is not liquidated[37] or arises out of a collateral transaction;[38] but it has also been held that a counterclaim or set-off does not meet the requirement of a meritorious defense.[39]

The judgment will not be opened on the ground that defendant had been mistaken as to the legal effect of a stipulation in the bond on which the judgment was entered;[40] nor will it be opened to let in matters of defense which arise subsequent to the entry of the judgment.[41]

Statute of limitations. The court may in its discretion open a judgment where it appears that the statute of limitations had run against the debt at the time the judgment was entered;[42] but a judgment should not be opened for the sole purpose of affording an opportunity to plead the statute of limitations to a defendant who has already had his day in court.[43]

§ 325. —— Affidavits and Other Evidence

a. Affidavits and counter-affidavits
b. Presumptions and burden of proof
c. Admissibility and weight and sufficiency

a. Affidavits and Counter-Affidavits

It is generally held to be within the discretion of the court to hear and determine an application to open or vacate a confessed judgment either on affidavits or on oral testimony given in open court.

Disaffirmance

Where judgment by warrant of attorney was entered on a note made by adult defendant during his minority and, on motion to set aside the judgment, defendant made no showing of disaffirmance of note, there was no "valid defense" to the action.—McKenzie v. Tellis, Ohio App., 47 N.E.2d 253.

In Illinois

(1) Denial of motion to open up judgment by confession on a promissory note, supported by affidavit of defendant that he had a counterclaim has been held to be error.—State Bank of Blue Island v. Kott, 54 N.E.2d 897, 323 Ill.App. 27.

(2) Verified motion to vacate judgment by confession in action on note given for part of purchase price of business, requesting leave to file counterclaim against plaintiff for damages for false representations of material facts by way of inducing defendant to enter into oral agreement to purchase, and stating desire to include charge against plaintiff for difference between contract purchase price of truck and O.P.A. selling price, alleged a good defense, and court should have set aside judgment and permitted defense to be made.—Gilmore v. Mix, App., 67 N.E.2d 313.

(3) It has also been held, however, that a judgment by confession will not be opened to permit a defendant to file a counterclaim or cross-statement.—Bankers Bldg. v. Bishop, 61 N.E.2d 276, 326 Ill.App. 256, certiorari denied Bishop v. Bankers Bldg., 66 S.Ct. 1352—Mayer v. Tyler, 19 N.E.2d 211, 298 Ill.App. 632—Busse v. Where issues were sharply contested, issues should not have been resolved on affidavits and motion should have been denied without prejudice to plenary action to vacate judgment since in such an action, court could afford adequate protection to the parties.—Smith v. Kent, 18 N.Y.S.2d 262, 259 App.Div. 117.

Plaintiff entitled to hearing

Where defendant against whom a judgment on confession without an action had been entered made application to vacate such judgment, plaintiff was entitled to an opportunity to present the facts in connection with the execution, delivery, and filing of the confession of judgment and the entry thereof.—Gotham Credit Corporation v. Ferdman, 13 N.Y.S.2d 1011.

Granting reargument and taking additional depositions at hearing on matter of opening judgment entered by confession held discretionary.—Holland Furnace Co. v. Gabriel, 157 A. 373, 102 Pa.Super. 573.

Testimony offered

Where answer accompanying motion to vacate judgment showed grounds for vacation, court should have heard testimony offered.—Canton Implement Co. v. Rauh, 175 N.E. 230, 37 Ohio App. 544.

It has been held, however, that the question of a meritorious defense is to be determined solely on the affidavits submitted in support of the application,[45] and that for such purpose the allegations of the affidavits are to be taken as true.[46] Under this rule a showing sufficient to warrant opening the judgment is made where the evidence contained in the affidavits in support of the application makes out a prima facie defense to the claim for which judgment was entered.[47]

Counter-affidavits in opposition to those submitted in support of the application may be received and considered where the question involved is purely one for the court,[48] and the court may refuse to disturb the judgment if the counter-affidavits are as strong and convincing as the affidavits of the moving party,[49] but it has been held that counter-affidavits cannot be considered on the question of the merits of defendant's proposed defense.[50]

b. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

Ordinarily in a proceeding to open or vacate a confessed judgment the burden of proof is on the applicant.

As a general rule the party who moves to have a judgment by confession opened or vacated must assume the burden of proving the facts on which he relies as the ground of his application,[51] except that in some jurisdictions, where defendant alleges that the note on which the judgment was entered is a forgery, the burden of establishing the genuineness of the note is on plaintiff in the judgment.[52] General presumptions and inferences of fact apply,[53] including the presumption in favor of the regularity and validity of a judgment.[54]

45. Ill.—Walrus Mfg. Co. v. Wilcox, 25 N.E.2d 132, 303 Ill.App. 286.

Right to cross-examine

Allegations deemed admitted

(1) Where no counter-affidavits are filed, the court must accept as true the material allegations in a verified motion to vacate a judgment by confession on a note.—Gilmore v. Mix, 67 N.E.2d 313, 329 Ill. App. 177.

(2) In proceeding by defendant to vacate plaintiff's confession judgment, the truth of allegations of material facts contained in plaintiff's counter-affidavit was necessarily admitted, where such allegations were not denied in defendant's additional affidavit.—May v. Chas. O. Larson Co., 26 N.E.2d 139, 304 Ill.App. 137.

(3) Where plaintiff failed to file a counter-affidavit in defense of judgment, case was properly heard on motion to vacate and supporting affidavit.—Doss v. Sievers, 14 N.E. 2d 677, 295 Ill.App. 107.

(4) If defendants placed application to open confession judgment on argument list for disposition on petition and answer, pertinent facts set forth in answer could be accepted as true.—Matovich v. Gradich, 187 A. 65, 123 Pa.Super. 355.

Purpose of rule

The rule preventing use of counter-affidavits going to the merits of defense on motion to vacate judgment entered by confession was intended to prevent depriving a party of the right of a trial by jury.—Walrus Mfg. Co. v. Wilcox, 25 N.E.2d 132, 303 Ill.App. 286.

The same presumptions exist in favor of a judgment by confession entered in term time as in case of a judgment entered by service of process, but the rule is different where judgment is entered by confession in vacation.—Rixmann v. Witwer, 63 N.E.2d 607, 327 Ill.App. 205.

c. Admissibility and Weight and Sufficiency

The general rules of admissibility of evidence apply in proceedings to open or vacate a confessed judgment; and the court will open or set aside the judgment where, and only where, there is clear, positive, and satisfactory evidence of the grounds alleged in the petition or motion and of the existence of a meritorious defense.

The general rules relating to the relevancy, materiality, and competency of the evidence in civil actions apply in determining the admissibility of evidence.[55]

It has been held that the measure of proof required to open a judgment by confession cannot be defined by rule,[56] that the court will open or set aside the judgment where, and only where, there is clear, positive, and satisfactory evidence of the grounds alleged in the petition or motion and of the existence of a meritorious defense,[57] and that

Answer not responsive

In proceeding on petition to vacate a judgment obtained on a judgment note, on ground of failure of consideration, wherein plaintiff filed answer which was evasive in not averring real consideration for the note, plaintiff was held to a higher degree of proof since his answer was not responsive.—Welch v. Sultez, 13 A.2d 399, 338 Pa. 583.

Negligence barring defense

Testimony of defendant, denying his signature of note sued on, as to presence of rubber stamp facsimile of his signature on his desk, did not show negligence barring defense of forgery as matter of law.—First Nat. Bank v. Albright, 170 A. 370, 111 Pa.Super. 392.

the grounds relied on for opening or setting aside the judgment must be established by a preponderance of the evidence.[58] It has also been held that applicant is entitled to relief where the evidence establishes that there is a real and substantial conflict as to the merits of the claim for which the judgment was entered.[59] The test has been held to be whether or not the evidence would justify a verdict or decree in defendant's favor on the merits;[60] the mere fact alone that there is a conflict of evidence is not sufficient,[61] and the judgment should not be opened where the preponderance of the evidence is against defendant,[62] or where the moving party's testimony is contradicted, and is in no way corroborated.[63]

On the other hand, the judgment should be opened and defendant allowed a trial where he has made out a case by a preponderance of the evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict in his favor,[64] or where the evidence is such that the contested matter is in such doubt as would warrant submitting the issue to a jury,[65] or where defendant, although contradicted, presents evidence, which, if true, constitutes a good defense to the judgment, and such evidence is corroborated by one or more witnesses or circumstances.[66]

Where the claim for which judgment was entered is attacked for fraud, it has been held that the evidence of fraud must be clear, precise, and indubitable.[67] It has also been held that, where there is clear evidence to sustain the averment of forgery, the judgment should be opened, notwithstanding such evidence is contradicted.[68] More than a pre-

Prior determination

Judgment debtor's rule to show cause why confession of judgment should not be stricken off and money held by garnishee decreed not sub-

of discretion.[73] On the other hand, it has been held that where it is shown that defendant has a good legal defense, it is the duty of the court to set aside or open the judgment to let in such defense, and a refusal to do so is erroneous.[74]

The court may determine the issues itself[75] or may direct an issue to be tried by a jury.[76] It has been held that the court in submitting an issue to ject to attachment did not raise defense on merits of judgment, and hence order discharging such rule was not res judicata precluding consideration of subsequent rule to show cause why judgment should not be opened and debtor let into a defense.—Albert M. Greenfield & Co. v. Roberts, 5 A.2d 642, 135 Pa.Super. 328.

Opening judgment of revival

Where a judgment of revival is entered on a confession to revive an old judgment, and evidence is offered in support of the petition to open that the confession of judgment was made in pursuance of a conspiracy to cheat and defraud, it is not an abuse of discretion for the court to open the judgment of revival, but such order should not include the original judgment, where the petition does not ask that it be opened, or the evidence does not call for any interference with it.—McPherson v. Cole, 87 A. 708, 240 Pa. 444, followed in 87 A. 709, 240 Pa. 448—34 C.J. p 417 note 13.

A "feigned issue" framed to try questions of fact, on making absolute rule to open judgment to permit defendant to interpose defense, means issue at instance of court or of parties to determine fact which court has either not power or is unwilling to decide, and such issue proceeds, not from right of parties to have matter determined by jury, but from fact that in rule to open judgment court is exercising its inherent equitable powers and may prefer question of fact to be determined by jury.—Miles v. Layton, 193 A. 567, 8 W.W.Harr.,Del., 411, 112 A.L.R. 786.

Purpose of submission

Submission of issue to jury on hearing of rule to show cause why judgment by confession entered on warrant of attorney should not be opened is for purpose of informing conscience of court on particular questions embraced in issue.—Chandler v. Miles, 193 A. 576, 8 W.W. Harr.,Del., 431.

a jury is in effect opening the judgment for a limited purpose.[77]

Scope of inquiry. Where the matter is heard on motion or petition and answer, the hearing is limited to matters raised by such pleadings,[78] and it has been held that if the answer is responsive and denies the facts averred in the petition and no evidence is taken in support of the petition, the court is bound to decide all disputed facts in favor of plaintiff in the judgment,[79] and the only question remaining for discussion is as to the validity of the entry of the judgment.[80] It has been held that the hearing should be limited to the questions whether defendant has a valid defense prima facie and whether he has acted with due diligence,[81] and that the court should not pass on the merits of the defense alleged where a valid defense is prima facie shown,[82] since such determination deprives defendant of his day in court and of a right to appeal from the decision.[83] It has also been held that the court should not consider the question of a meritorious defense until it has first determined whether grounds to vacate the judgment exist.[84]

Relief. In a proceeding to open or vacate a confessed judgment, the court may grant such relief against the judgment as is appropriate under the circumstances.[85] On a proper showing the court may vacate the judgment,[86] open the judgment gen-

Questions of law and fact

(1) The question whether the note on its face purported to be a sealed instrument but not question of whether the corporation intended to adopt the word "seal" as its corporate seal for the occasion was a "question of law" to be determined by the court on inspection.—Collins v. Tracy Grill & Bar Corporation, 19 A.2d 617, 144 Pa.Super. 440.

(2) A petition to open judgment on a judgment note under seal which averred that petitioner "never received any consideration by reason of the execution . . . of said judgment note," and answer averring that petition did not present a valid defense, raised the issue and presented a legal rather than a factual question.—Shinn v. Stemler, 45 A.2d 242, 158 Pa.Super. 350.

(3) Particular questions held to be questions of fact for the jury.—Guadiere v. Simeone, 29 A.2d 702, 151 Pa.Super. 65—White Co. v. Francis, 95 Pa.Super. 315—Kaufman v. Karuza, Pa.Com.Pl., 33 Luz.Leg.Reg. 416.

Estoppel

The court was not required to consider question whether defendant was estopped to question validity of note where question of estoppel was not raised in answer to amended petition.—Sprenger, now for Use of Stoecker, v. Litten, 15 A.2d 527, 142 Pa.Super. 194.

Void instrument

A petition to set aside confession of judgment on a note need not allege error or fraud respecting signing of note, to admit evidence concerning proof of maturity of debt subsequent to signing thereof, where note was an absolute nullity because executed and given in contravention of prohibitory law.—Taylor v. Shreveport Fertilizer Works, La. App., 197 So. 164.

Vacation in part

If the judgment includes several claims or items, some of which are due and others not, or some of which are sufficiently described in the statement and others not, it may be vacated or set aside as to those demands which cannot be supported and left standing as to the others.—Wells v. Gieseke, 8 N.W. 380, 27 Minn. 478—34 C.J. p 417 note 18.

Joint judgment

(1) A judgment in assumpsit is an entity and where it is rendered against several persons it cannot be set aside as to one party without setting it aside as to all.—First Nat. Bank v. Yakey, 253 Ill.App. 128.

(2) Order made on motion of one of two makers sued jointly on judgment note, directing court to open judgment entered by confession to admit defense of material alteration after execution of note, was held to reopen judgment as to both defendants.—First Nat. Bank v. May, 231 Ill.App. 509.

(3) Where, however, a joint confession of judgment on a note is entered against the two signers thereof, and one of the signers had been discharged from his liability on the note by bankruptcy proceedings, it has been held that the court may properly vacate the judgment as to the bankrupt and open up the judgment only as to the cosignor.—Goodman American Ice Cream Co. v. Mendelsohn, 274 Ill.App. 253.

(4) Where court vacated joint judgment as to deceased defendant, it could subsequently enter vacation as to other joint defendant.—Saulpaugh v. Born, 154 N.E. 166, 22 Ohio App. 275.

(5) Where judgment is entered by confession against joint and several obligors after the death of one of them and the warrant of attorney is joint and not joint and several and the court, on motion of the surviving obligor, vacates the judgment, the rights of the obligee are not prejudiced thereby where the obligee is granted leave to file an amended statement of claim and to proceed against the surviving obligor.—Genden v. erally,[87] open the judgment, but restrict the issues to be tried,[88] or open the judgment and frame an issue for a jury.[89] On the other hand, relief will be denied where a proper showing is not made.[90]

Imposition of terms. Terms or conditions may be imposed on defendant, on granting his application to open the judgment,[91] such as the payment of costs[92] and reasonable attorney's fees,[93] if the judgment is confirmed. It has been held that it is not proper to impose as a condition precedent that defendant shall bring into court the sum which is supposed to be due,[94] but the deposit of a sum concededly due may be required,[95] although it has been held that the court may set aside the judgment to let in the defense of usury, without a tender of the amount due.[96] The judgment may be allowed to stand as security to abide the result,[97] although, as discussed infra § 327, it has been held that this is the normal effect of an order which simply opens the judgment as distinguished from an order vacating or setting aside the judgment. Terms may also be imposed on plaintiff as a condition of a refusal to open the judgment.[98]

§ 327. —— Operation and Effect of Opening or Vacating

The opening of a judgment by confession does not vacate the judgment, but the vacation of such a judgment places the action in the same state as though it had been commenced in the ordinary procedure by summons.

The opening of a judgment by confession does not vacate the judgment;[99] it stands as security until the determination of the case on the merits.[1] The vacation of a judgment by confession places the action in the same state as though it had been commenced in the ordinary procedure by summons.[2]

If the judgment is opened generally, and without terms, plaintiff is put to the proof of his cause of action precisely as though no judgment had been entered.[3] Where the court in opening the judgment did not direct the parties to file pleadings, the petition to open and the answer thereto may be taken as the pleadings.[4] It has been held that plaintiff is restricted to the cause of action for which the judgment was entered and that he cannot change it,[5] but defendant may set up on the trial any defense which would have been available to him if an action had been brought, instead of a judgment being entered, on the debt or instrument in suit,[6] although he cannot set up matters of defense which have arisen subsequent to the judgment.[7]

The court in opening judgment may frame an issue,[8] and in such case the trial should be confined to such issue.[9]

By asking for and obtaining leave to plead in the case of a judgment entered by confession, all technicalities and objections to the judgment are waived,[10] and defendant is limited to the merits.[11] It is not sufficient for defendant to file a general demurrer to the declaration,[12] and, if he declines to plead to the declaration, he may be defaulted for failure to comply with the rule to plead.[13] An order setting aside a judgment as to one only of several defendants merely restrains plaintiff from executing the judgment on defendant as to whom it is set aside.[14]

On the trial of the action after the judgment is opened, general rules apply as to procedure,[15] pre-

Attack on garnishment
Judgment debtor's rule to show cause why confession of judgment should not be stricken off and money held by garnishee under attachment execution on judgment decreed not subject to attachment and debtor afforded opportunity to show that attached money was not his personal funds was not a rule to show cause why judgment should not be opened generally and debtor let into defense on merits, and did not raise question of defense on merits of judgment.—Albert M. Greenfield & Co. v. Roberts, 5 A.2d 642, 135 Pa.Super. 328.

Judgment against maker of note
When a judgment against the maker on a note is vacated, the same relief is afforded the indorsers.—Gilmore v. Mix, 67 N.E.2d 313, 329 Ill.App. 177.

Judgment on transcript
Where a judgment by confession is stricken off, a judgment on a transcript thereof entered in another county falls with the original judgment.—Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 297.

Power over order vacating judgment
Where court vacated judgment by confession instead of entering order merely allowing judgment to be opened up, and thereafter court entered a summary judgment, and on realizing within thirty days that it was a mistake to vacate the judgment, court still had jurisdiction and was justified in rectifying mistake by setting aside the order of vacation and reinstating judgment by confession, leaving two judgments, which was permissible under statute.—National Builders Bank of Chicago v. Filing of plea
Under rule requiring defendant to be summoned and show cause why judgment by confession under power in note should be vacated, opened, or modified, no plea should have been filed until trial court reopened the judgment and permitted defendant to file pleas.—Foland v. Hoffman, Md., 47 A.2d 62.

Judgment on retrial. If on the retrial the issues are found for plaintiff, the judgment should direct that the previous judgment continue in full force and effect,[21] and should not be for a greater sum than was allowed by the prior judgment.[22] Under such circumstances the entry of a separate and independent judgment is erroneous.[23] Where the issues are found for defendant after the judgment is opened, the judgment should be vacated and declared null and void.[24]

G. JUDGMENTS BY CONSENT, OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE, AND ON MOTION OR SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS

§ 328. Consent Judgments

The amendment, opening, or vacating of judgments by consent is considered infra §§ 329, 330.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 329. —— Amendment

The consent of all parties is generally required to permit amendment of a consent judgment, except for fraud or mutual mistake, but this rule does not preclude correction of clerical errors or prevent amendment where the judgment reserves the cause for further orders.

As a general rule, a consent judgment may not be amended, modified, or corrected in any essential particular except with the consent of all the parties thereto,[25] in the absence of fraud or mutual mis-

On a petition to open judgment averring a parol contemporaneous agreement as one of the inducements to the signing of a judgment note, the effect of granting the petition is not to permit defendant to contradict the terms of a written instrument, but to prove by parol evidence the existence of the agreement and the circumstances under which it was made.—Hotaling v. Liability on note Validity of amendment to consent judgment entered by parties to show that one defendant was primarily and other secondarily liable on notes depended on whether defendant primarily liable consented to amendment.—Deitz v. Bolch, 183 S.E. 884, 209 N.C. 202.

Where the amendment is not material, the rule does not apply.—Wiggam Milk Co. v. Johnson, 13 N.E.2d 522, 213 Ind. 508.

take,[26] and this rule applies to cases where a party has acquired rights in the final result, which would be jeopardized by a change in the terms of the consent judgment.[27] In this connection it has been said that, if the court should change a consent judgment in any material respect without the consent of the parties, it would cease to be the judgment agreed on by them,[28] and that such exercise of judicial power would be a practical denial of the right of the party prejudiced to be heard according to law.[29]

It has been said, however, that the power of a court to revise its judgments for protection of adjudicated rights in relation to changed conditions that affect those rights in respect of their judicial enforcement is inherent, and that such power exists whether the judgment was entered after litigation or by consent,[30] and that a formal order of correction is not essential to granting relief consistent with the agreement.[31] It has also been held that, where a judgment fails, in a material respect, to accord with the stipulation made, relief should be sought by motion for new trial or appeal, and that such a judgment cannot be corrected under code provisions governing amendment of judgments.[32]

Clerical defects or omissions in the judgment, caused by mistake, may be amended nunc pro tunc,[33] and the court may amend a judgment to correct a misnomer of defendant either during or after the term at which the judgment was rendered.[34] The rule requiring consent to effect a modification or amendment of a consent judgment or decree will not be carried so far as to confer on a party seeking to enforce an unconscionable penalty provided for in a consent judgment the right to obtain affirmative relief contrary to the paramount duty of the court to do equity,[35] and, where a consent decree or judgment may indirectly affect the rights of many persons in addition to those of the litigants, the rule that courts will not modify a consent decree except on the consent of the parties will not be too rigidly enforced.[36]

Reservation for further orders; interlocutory judgments. Where a consent judgment reserves the cause for further orders, the court may thereafter modify the judgment as conditions may require in conformity with justice and the legal rights of the parties.[37] It has been held that an interlocutory consent judgment may be modified by the court to meet changed conditions,[38] but that such a judgment, in strict accordance with a stipulation entered into between the parties, cannot be amended on a motion made by one of the parties and opposed by the other,[39] the remedy of the party objecting to the form of the judgment being to make a motion to be relieved from the stipulation and to have the judgment vacated.[40]

a. In General

Ordinarily, a consent judgment may not be opened, set aside, or vacated without consent of the parties or proof of grounds adequate for such relief, but, before the judgment has become final, the trial court retains plenary power to set it aside.

not be opened, set aside, or vacated without the consent of all the parties,[41] except in due proceedings on proper grounds, as discussed infra subdivisions b and c of this section. The trial court has power, however, to open or vacate a judgment entered by consent or agreement of the parties where a good cause therefor is shown,[42] the granting or refusing of the application being within the sound discretion of the court.[43] It has been held that, before lapse of the time necessary to make a consent judgment final in character, the court may lawfully vacate it,[44] and under some practice the court has plenary power over consent judgments during the term at which they are rendered and within such time may vacate and set aside such a judgment whenever justice and equity so require.[45]

b. Grounds

A consent judgment will not be opened or vacated in the absence of adequate grounds, but such a judgment may be opened or vacated for want of consent, fraud, collusion, or mutual mistake of fact.

A judgment by consent will not be opened or vacated in the absence of adequate grounds therefor,[46] especially where the conditions have become such that the opposing party would be prejudiced thereby,[47] and, where the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of both the parties and the general subject matter of the action, no objection to the merits is reviewable on motion to vacate a consent judgment.[48] Generally speaking, a judgment by consent will not be opened or vacated in the absence of fraud or mistake or want of consent in fact.[49] A consent judgment may not be set aside on such grounds as that applicant made a bad bargain;[50] erroneous advice of counsel;[51] the existence of a legal defense which might have been pleaded in the action;[52] errors and irregularities of procedure;[53] misconduct or negligence of party's attorney, unmixed with collusion or fraud of the other party;[54] failure of a defendant duly cited to employ counsel or file an answer;[55] nonperformance of stipulations to be performed subsequent to entry of judgment;[56] improper distribution of the proceeds of the judgment;[57] or breach of parol agreement made out of court consenting to entry of judgment by default, where a rule of court refuses to recognize such parol agreements.[58]

Want of consent. A purported consent judgment may generally be opened or vacated where it was entered without the authority or consent of the moving party,[59] or in violation of the agreement of the parties.[60] This rule has been applied to invalidate judgments entered on the unauthorized consent of the attorneys,[61] although there is authority to the effect that a judgment regularly entered pursuant to agreement of the attorneys may not be opened after the term on the ground that the agreement was not authorized,[62] that showing that a party did not consent will not justify vacation of the judgment where there is failure to show nonconsent of his attorney,[63] and that the client is bound by the unauthorized consent of his attorney within the scope of his apparent authority so as to preclude the client from securing vacation of a judgment entered on the unauthorized consent or agreement of the attorney.[64] It has also been stated that courts are not inclined to set aside a judgment rendered pursuant to a compromise, even though the attorney who agreed may have lacked actual authority to do so, in the absence of a showing of injury to the party seeking to set aside the judgment.[65] An amendment of a consent judgment may be set aside on proof that the amendment was made without consent of the party concerned.[66] It has been held that a judgment affecting the rights of persons under disability, entered by consent of representatives of such persons, may be set aside if found prejudicial to their interests.[67]

Disregard of petitioner's wishes

Fact that consent judgment by insane petitioner's counsel in prior litigation was against petitioner's wishes is not ground for setting aside prior adjudication in absence of fraud, it not being presumed that an insane person is capable of giving proper direction as to conduct of litigation, and no more appearing from the application to set aside the consent judgment than that petitioner's guardian ad litem may have been negligent.—Gray v. Workmen's compensation

Where statutory provisions state that no settlement or compromise shall be made except on the terms provided by the statute in workmen's compensation cases, the employer and employee cannot make a settlement except on the statutory terms, and a consent judgment entered on agreement of counsel and not in accordance with the statute may be set aside, and in fact should be set aside for noncompliance with the statute even if it is rendered after proof and a full hearing.—Ledford v. Johnson City Foundry & Machine Co., 88 S.W.2d 804, 169 Tenn. 430.

cated on the ground of collusion[68] or fraud,[69] as where defendant was tricked or misled by false representations,[70] but may not be set aside on this ground where the facts fail to disclose fraud of a remediable character.[71]

Generally speaking, a trial court may set aside or vacate a consent judgment on the ground of a mistake of fact,[72] at least if mutual in character,[73] or shared by the court,[74] but it may not vacate a consent judgment on the basis of a mistake of law.[75] Where the party or his authorized counsel consents to entry of judgment with full knowledge of the facts, ordinarily it may not be set aside or vacated on the alleged ground of inadvertence or mistake,[76] surprise or excusable neglect,[77] or unavoidable casualty and misfortune;[78] but it has been held ground for vacation of a consent judgment that it resulted from a mistake of fact arising from excusable neglect,[79] or that defendant was prevented from appearing or defending by unavoidable casualty.[80] While usury has been held a ground for vacating a consent judgment,[81] it has also been held that consenting to judgment waives the defense of usury precluding defendant from having judgment vacated for usury as matter of right.[82]

c. Procedure and Relief

(1) In general
(2) Time for application
(3) Relief; effect of setting judgment aside

(1) In General

Ordinarily, vacation of a consent judgment may be sought by motion or petition, although an independent action may lie in some jurisdictions. The attack on the judgment by action or motion should be on notice to the other party and the burden rests on the plaintiff or movant to show grounds for the relief sought.

As a general rule a consent judgment may be vacated on a petition or motion,[83] addressed to the court which entered it.[84] Under some practice it has been held that ordinarily the proper procedure to vacate a consent judgment is by independent action,[85] but that, when a party to an action denies that he gave consent to the judgment as entered, the proper procedure in attacking such judgment is by motion in the cause.[86] Where a motion to set aside the judgment is based solely on the moving party's want of consent, he may not attack the court's jurisdiction in a motion for rehearing after denial of the original motion to set aside the judgment.[87] Where the court on its own motion orders a case dismissed "as to personal judgment of defendant," there is a clerical misprision not precluding the court from entering a personal consent judgment.[88]

An action or application to set aside or vacate a consent judgment should be instituted on due notice to the other party,[89] and a motion or petition in the cause should show adequate grounds for vacating the judgment,[90] and under some practice should be supported by affidavit, or sworn to by applicant or his representative,[91] and then supported by proof.[92] It has been held, however, that, where allegations of a petition to vacate a consent judgment are undenied, they may be accepted as true.[93] One seeking to set aside or vacate a consent judgment against him should sufficiently show a meritorious defense,[94] and the burden rests on him to prove his allegations as to the grounds for the relief sought.[95] The judge need not invoke findings of fact by a jury on his own motion where no such motion is made by the parties, but on the contrary both counsel appear and enter on a trial of the application before the court,[96] and it has been held that, where motion is made to vacate the judgment for lack of consent, the court may determine the fact of consent without allowing a jury trial as matter of right.[97]

(2) Time for Application

An application to set aside or vacate a consent judgment should be made in due time and ordinarily during the term at which the judgment was entered, although under certain circumstances the application may properly be made after the term.

A motion or other application to vacate a consent judgment should be timely made,[98] as within the

Where counsel impliedly consents that a judgment not conforming to the stipulation of the parties should be opened or modified in the event of a certain contingency as provided by the stipulation but not by the judgment, he thereby waives the necessity of any showing that the defect in the judgment was not the fault of the other party seeking to open it.—Midwest Refining Co. v. period prescribed by statute,[99] and may be denied for delay amounting to laches.[1] Where a motion to vacate a consent judgment is made within the period prescribed by statute, the court retains jurisdiction to consider and pass on the motion after expiration of such period.[2]

In accordance with the general rules discussed supra §§ 228–235, an application to set aside or vacate a consent judgment may be made at the same term in which the judgment was entered,[3] but ordinarily may not be made in vacation,[4] or at a subsequent term,[5] unless a sufficient excuse for the delay is shown,[6] or the ground for vacation is one available after the term.[7] There is authority, however, to the effect that the common-law rule limiting the control of the court over its judgments to the term at which they were rendered applies only to judgments in controversial cases and not to judgments entered by consent without contest.[8]

(3) Relief; Effect of Setting Judgment Aside

A consent judgment, if vacated, should be set aside in its entirety and as to all joint defendants. The effect of setting aside a consent judgment is to reinstate the former case.

If a consent judgment is set aside, it must be set aside in its entirety;[9] a party may not have it set aside as far as it is unfavorable to him, and claim the benefit of the favorable part;[10] and, where the judgment is against several joint defendants, if it is set aside as to part of them, it must be set aside as to all.[11] The fact that an order vacates a consent judgment, although the notice of motion asked merely for a modification, so that the order granted went beyond the relief asked by the motion, does not in itself constitute sufficient ground for vacating the order;[12] but on appeal from such an order the superior court may, in an otherwise proper case, reverse the order with instructions to the trial court to modify the consent judgment in compliance with the relief asked in the original motion.[13]

Where a consent judgment is set aside, the former case will be reinstated and the parties given the same rights as to the prosecution and defense thereof as they would have had before the consent judgment was entered, together with any additional right germane to the litigation.[14]

§ 331. Judgments on Offer and Acceptance

A judgment entered on offer and acceptance may be vacated on sufficient grounds, such as the absence of an authorized offer, or noncompliance with statutory requirements, but it may not be amended without consent of all parties.

In accordance with the general rules governing amendment and vacation of consent judgments, as discussed supra §§ 329–331, a judgment entered on acceptance of defendant's offer may be vacated on

Mutual mistake
A statute authorizing the court within one year after notice, in its discretion, to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake refers to a unilateral mistake and does not control a motion to vacate a consent judgment for mutual mistake, which latter the court may vacate on motion after expiration of the statutory period.—Elsen v. sufficient grounds.[15] Thus the judgment may be vacated if the offer of judgment was made without authority,[16] or the offer was not accepted in time,[17] or there was a noncompliance with statutory requirements.[18] A mistake of law is not sufficient ground for vacating the judgment.[19] However, a judgment entered on acceptance of defendant's offer ordinarily may not be changed without consent of all the parties.[20]

§ 332. Summary Judgments

A summary judgment on motion may be opened or vacated for good cause.

A summary judgment on motion may be opened or vacated for good cause shown.[21] A statutory provision relating to the opening and setting aside of judgments by default in actions does not, however, apply to judgments in summary proceedings.[22] Where defendant is permitted to file an amended answer, after plaintiff's motion for judgment has been sustained, such permission is, in effect, an informal setting aside of the order sustaining the motion.[23]

H. JUDGMENTS BY DEFAULT

§ 333. Opening, Amending, and Vacating Generally

A court has jurisdiction and power to amend, open, or vacate default judgments rendered by it during the term at which they are rendered, but not usually after expiration of the time prescribed by statute or at a subsequent term, although the latter rule is subject to some exceptions.

Subject to the rules of general application as to opening, amending, or vacating judgments, which are discussed supra §§ 228–235, a judgment by default may be amended or corrected in a proper case, at the instance of either party.[24] Likewise the power to open or to vacate a judgment extends to judgments rendered on default,[25] particularly under

Modification held improper

Where, in action on bond indemnifying owner against liability for cost of building constructed by lessee, summary judgment was granted for amount of liens adjudicated to be due in mechanics' lien action, order reducing summary judgment to amount realized on sale of property in mechanics' lien foreclosure action was improper, since no new situation arose subsequent to entry of judgment which could not have been foreseen and pleaded as defense in action on bond.—755 Seventh Ave. Corporation v. Bringing in additional defendants

In action against individuals, where default judgment was entered against individuals, title and judgment were not amendable by bringing in such defendants as trustees and making them additionally liable as trustees without opportunity to defend as such.—Greater New York Export House v. Hurtig, 267 N.Y.S. 173, 239 App.Div. 183, appeal dismissed Greater New York Export House v. Peirson, 193 N.E. 290, 265 N.Y. 500.

Clerical error

Where docket entry for default judgment was dated and judgment was filed Monday, October 15, but judgment as written and recorded bore date of Sunday, October 14, by clerical error, nunc pro tunc order correcting date of judgment was not erroneous, as against contention that judgment could not be corrected since it was void because it was rendered on Sunday.—Hays v. Hughes, Tex.Civ.App., 106 S.W.2d 724, error refused.

Excessive judgment

(1) Trial court had authority to reduce default judgment on showing that judgment was for a sum in excess of the amount due.—Spikings v. Ellis, 8 N.E.2d 962, 290 Ill.App. 585.

(2) Court should correct default judgment to extent that it included unauthorized interest.—Stratton & Terstegge Co. v. Begley, 61 S.W.2d 287, 249 Ky. 632.

Relief unwarranted by complaint

Defendant is concluded by default decree only as far as it is supported by the allegations in complaint and, if it gives relief in excess of, or different from, that to which plaintiff is entitled under complaint, decree may be modified to conform to the allegations.—Federal Land Bank of Columbia v. Davis, 1 S.E.2d 350, 215 N.C. 100.

Where defendant appeared after entry of default judgment against her, the only relief to which plaintiff would be entitled under its motion to amend judgment would be such relief as might be granted as a matter of course.—Irving Trust Co. v. Seltzer, 40 N.Y.S.2d 451, 265 App.Div. 696.

At chambers

Under statute a default judgment may be opened by the judge at chambers.—Whiteside v. Logan, 17 P. 34, 7 Mont. 373.

Failure of party to comply with statutes with regard to motions for new trial does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to set aside a default judgment.—Missouri Quarries Co. v. Brady, 219 P. 368, 95 Okl. 279.

In partition suit, where, at time of default by one defendant, mortgagee defendant had not answered but answer and cross petition of other defendants, which were subsequently adopted by defaulting defendant, were on file, and allegations of such pleadings, if true, would prevent partition and invalidate mortgagee's lien against defaulting defendant's interest, court had jurisdiction to set aside default.—Redding v. Redding, 284 N.W. 167, 226 Iowa 327.

Neglect or failure of attorneys

Statute relating to the general power of courts to permit amendments and relieve from defaults, etc., was held to refer only to default judgment taken through neglect or failure of an attorney.—Atwood v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 217 P. 600, 37 Idaho 554.

Spurious entry

A motion to set aside default judgment on ground that entry thereof was spurious invoked power and duty of court to expunge from record spurious entry rather than discretionary power incident to ordinary motion to set aside default judgment.—Du Pree v. Hart, 3 So.2d 183, 242 Ala. 690.

Judgment taken in defendant's absence on affidavit of proof was taken at trial within contemplation of statute authorizing new trial in cases tried by courts, provided application therefor is made within thirty days after judgment.—Nutley Finance Co. v. De Federicis, 150 A. 241, 8 N.J. Misc. 382.

Judgment held final

Where defendants file no motion to set aside, and do not appeal from, default judgment perpetuating injunction against them by court having jurisdiction of parties and subject matter, judgment becomes final.—Miller-Link Lumber Co. v. proceedings begun within the proper time and lawfully continued to the subsequent term.[31] The general rule is also subject to certain other exceptions;[32] and in at least one jurisdiction the court has power at any time to open a default judgment in order to give the parties a hearing or trial.[33] The only remedy after the term for irregular and erroneous, as distinguished from void, judgments is usually by new trial, review, writ of error, or appeal, as either may be appropriate and allowable by law, or by some other mode specially provided by statute.[34]

The authority to relieve a party in default, on application made in apt and proper time, is inherent in all courts of record exercising general jurisdiction,[35] and does not depend on statute unless expressly regulated thereby;[36] but, where the court is of special or limited jurisdiction, it cannot be exercised unless conferred by statute.[37]

In the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, courts may take off a default at any time before judgment,[38] or set aside a preliminary entry of default,[39] and a naked or simple default may be set aside at a subsequent term, on a proper showing.[40]

Inherent discretionary power

It has been held, however, that the common-law right to set aside a default judgment, either at term at which it is rendered, or at a subsequent term, is part of inherent discretionary power of a court of general jurisdiction.—Kelly v. Nonpayment of appearance fee within term

Where defendant presented petition to vacate judgment within term and defendant's appearance fee was paid after term, and hearing on petition and amendment was postponed by series of continuances without any break in continuity, court had jurisdiction thereafter to vacate judgment, notwithstanding appearance fee required by statute had not been paid when petition was presented and within term, since statute requiring appearance fee did not require defendant to pay fee until court allowed defendant to come into case and defend.—Wolf v. Proviso Hospital Ass'n, 33 N.E.2d 632, 309 Ill. App. 479.

County court

Under some statutes, however, a county court's order continuing to next term motion to set aside default judgment is void, and motion to set aside default judgment, not acted on before adjournment of term at which made, is discharged by operation of law, and, in effect, overruled.—Motor Inv. Inadvertent or improvident judgment

A trial court, entering default judgment through inadvertence or improvidence, has power, independently of statute, to correct such mistake by amending or setting aside judgment, as such action presents no question of judicial review on merits.—Phillips v. Trusheim, 156 P. 2d 25, 25 Cal.2d 913.

ment by default remains in the breast of the court until it is made final, and may, for good cause shown, be set aside at any time, even at a subsequent term, before the damages are assessed, or final judgment is rendered.[41]

Void judgments. Subject to any existing statutory provisions, where a default judgment is entirely void for want of jurisdiction, the power to vacate it or set it aside is not limited to the term at which it was rendered or otherwise, but may be exercised at a succeeding term, or at any time.[42]

Jurisdiction of particular courts and judge. Under some statutes, a judge is without power to set aside a default judgment entered by another judge unless the latter is absent or unable to act,[43] but generally the power to open or set aside default judgments is inherent in the court, not in the judge,[44] and the fact that a writ of inquiry after default was executed before another division of the court presided over by a different judge is immaterial.[45] The judge presiding in the division in which the action was pending may, in the absence of rules specifically prohibiting such procedure, order the hearing on application to vacate the default to be before the judge, then presiding in another division, who made the default order.[46] Where a default judgment rendered in the court of one county was opened on petition of one defendant who had the cause transferred to the court of another county on motion for change of venue, a codefendant's subsequent petition to open the judgment is properly filed in the court to which the cause had been transferred rather than in the court in which the default judgment was originally rendered.[47] The mere docketing of a district court judgment in common pleas court does not deprive the former of jurisdiction thereof to the extent of vacating it for want of jurisdiction over the person of defendant.[48] When authorized by statute, a default judgment rendered by the clerk of court may be vacated by the clerk or, on appeal from the clerk, by the presiding judge.[49]

Waiver. A person who ordinarily would be entitled to apply for the vacation of a default judgment may waive the right to such relief, or be estopped to ask for it, where he submits to and ratifies the judgment by participating in the further proceedings in the action.[50]

a. In General

Power of trial court to open default judgments during term see supra § 333.

In Texas

(1) A distinction is recognized between cases in which a good, sufficient, legal, or equitable excuse is required to be shown to support a motion to vacate, and cases in which only a slight showing, amounting only to some excuse, would be sufficient. The distinction turns on the presence, or absence, of facts showing that by the granting of the application the adverse party would be injured. Presumably the setting aside of a judgment at a subsequent term would be injurious, and hence in such a case a good excuse must be shown which implies a showing of the absence of negligence or exercise of ordinary care. On the other hand, if the application is made promptly at the same term, and the facts show that there will be no material delay, and the failure of the party to answer or appear in time is not due wholly to his fault or neglect, or that of his attorney, but there are some extenuating circumstances, then the application should be granted.—Borger v. Mineral Wells Clay Products Co., Civ. App., 80 S.W.2d 333.

(2) During the term at which it was rendered, the trial court may set aside a default judgment with, or without, express cause.—Gann v. Hopkins, Civ.App., 119 S.W. 2d 110.

60. Neb.—Barney v. Platte Valley Public Power & Irr. Dist., 23 N.W. 2d 335—Britt v. Byrkit, 268 N.W. 83, 131 Neb. 350—Lacey v. Citizens' Lumber & Supply Co., 248 N.W. 378, 124 Neb. 813.

tion to set it aside, and the ends of justice will be furthered thereby.[61]

The default, for which relief is provided, must be that of a litigant and not of a stranger to the proceeding;[62] and a stranger to the record is not in a position to ask to be relieved of a default or to have a decree set aside which was taken at a time when he was not a party to the action.[63]

Statutory provisions. Statutes relating to the setting aside of default judgments have been held to be constitutional,[64] and, being remedial, should be liberally construed so as to give litigants an opportunity to have the case disposed of on the merits to the end that justice be done;[65] but, where the matter is governed by statute, one of the statutory grounds must be shown.[66] Statutes dealing with vacation and modification of judgments are exclusive on a motion to vacate a default judgment, unless by reason of special circumstances the statutory remedy is inadequate.[67] A statute providing that no judgment may be set aside for matter not previously objected to if the complaint contain a substantial cause of action does not apply to a default judgment entered against an innocent party.[68] In order to have both a default and a judgment thereon set aside under some statutes a showing as to mistake, or the like, must be shown as to each.[69] An amendatory statute applies to a motion to set aside a judgment entered before the statute goes into effect where the motion was made after the effective date of the statute and within the time allowed for the motion by the statute in force at the time the judgment was entered.[70] A statutory provision requiring the court to render judgment in specified actions if defendant does not appear and defend does not preclude defendant from showing cause for a failure to answer or demur within the prescribed time.[71]

Where service of original writ was in fact made by sheriff and judgment for default of appearance entered, statute permitting "taking off" of judgment by following certain procedure at or before term following entry of default judgment did not authorize reopening of judgment, such statute covering only the situations where sheriff had returned that defendant had been served, when in fact this was not the case.—Yerkes v. as distinguished from merely voidable or erroneous, is ground for vacating it,[72] as where the judgment is invalid for want of jurisdiction of the person,[73] or where the judgment is based on a defective affidavit for publication of summons,[74] or where the court is without jurisdiction to adjudicate the question determined or to give the particular relief granted.[75] A party has a right to presume that no other or different judgment will be taken against him by default than the facts alleged will warrant,[76] and a judgment against a party in his individual capacity which is void because no facts were alleged in the complaint which would permit a judgment against him in that capacity will be vacated.[77] Also, a final judgment after default will be set aside for want of jurisdiction where summons was addressed to defendant as an individual and the declaration declared against him in a representative capacity.[78]

(2) Irregularity of Judgment in General

A default judgment may be vacated for irregularity in the proceedings leading to the entry of the judgment, as distinguished from mere error, but not ordinarily for merely technical, formal, and unimportant irregularities.

Error in law as ground for vacating default judgment see infra subdivision g of this section.
Irregularity as ground for vacating judgments generally see supra § 268.
Objections as to pleadings as ground for setting aside default judgments see infra subdivision j of this section.

"Irregularity" defined

(1) Irregularity authorizing setting aside judgment on motion is want of adherence to some prescribed rule or mode of proceeding, by omitting to do something necessary for orderly conduct of suit, or doing it in unseasonable time or in improper manner.—Ealy v. McGahen, 21 P.2d 84, 37 N.M. 246.

(2) An irregularity is a departure in legal procedure from things which are regular; it is something by way of procedure which is unusual and irregular.—Rabb v. Board of Com'rs of Cuyahoga County, 173 N.E. 255, 257, 36 Ohio App. 481.

Irregular and erroneous judgments defined and distinguished

An "irregular judgment" is one rendered contrary to the course and practice of the court, whereas an "erroneous judgment" is one rendered according to the course and practice of court, but contrary to law, or on a mistaken view of the law, or on an erroneous application of legal principles, an erroneous judgment being not necessarily irregular.—Simms v. Sampson, 20 S. E.2d 554, 221 N.C. 379—Wynne v. Conrad, 17 S.E.2d 514, 220 N.C. 355—Wellons v. Lassiter, 157 S.E. 434, 200 N.C. 474—Finger v. Smith, 133 S.E. 186, 191 N.C. 818—Duffer v. Brunson, 125 S.E. 619, 188 N.C. 789.

Voidable judgment

(1) Where a judgment by default is entered in an action on a petition not filed by the date fixed in the notice and ten days before the term, it is the right of defendant directly to attack the judgment as voidable, and the duty of the court to set it aside and have it vacated.—Sioux County v. Kosters, 191 N.W. 315, 194 Iowa 1300.

(2) Fact that entry of default judgment without a jury was without authority, however, was held not proper ground of motion to set aside the judgment, but under statute merely rendered it voidable on direct bill of exceptions.—McDuffie Oil & Fertilizer Co. v. Iler, 118 S.E. 772, 30 Ga.App. 671.

Failure to serve copy of statement of claim

A judgment entered for want of appearance will be stricken off on defendant's application where plaintiff failed to serve on defendant a copy of the statement of claim filed, as required by court rule.—Northwestern Nat. Bank & Trust Co. v. Heenerfauth, 18 Pa.Dist. & Co. 534.

Held not irregularity within rule

(1) Convening term hour before customary.—Kingery v. Reliance Fertilizer Co., 158 S.E. 346, 43 Ga. App. 240.

(2) Correction of recorded notice of materialman's lien by interlineation of correct description of property in notice without new acknowledgment or verification.—Ealy v. McGahen, 21 P.2d 84, 37 N.M. 246.

(3) Court order, allowing defendants to withdraw their pleadings, which specified answer only and not cross complaint.—Sheppard v. Sandfer, 102 P.2d 668, 44 N.M. 357.

(4) Erroneous finding of fact.—Bank of Commerce v. Williams, 69 P.2d 525, 52 Wyo. 1, 110 A.L.R. 1463.

(5) Failure to introduce evidence to show that note had been registered with county treasurer and tax paid thereon as provided by statute. —Thomas v. Tucker, 86 P.2d 1011, 184 Okl. 304.

(6) Inclusion in judgment foreclosing materialman's lien a nonlienable item.—Ealy v. McGahen, 21 P. 2d 84, 37 N.M. 246.

(7) Making order of revivor without first spreading on the record, a conditional order of revivor as provided by code.—French v. Friesinger, Ohio App., 38 N.E.2d 90.

(8) Mere failure to plead.—Rabb v. Board of Com'rs of Cuyahoga County, 173 N.E. 255, 36 Ohio App. 481.

due season,[81] particularly where the proceeding to set aside the default was belatedly taken.[82] In order to set aside a default judgment as being irregularly entered, the court must test the right of movant by the same principles as those by which it tests the right of a movant against whom a judgment was entered in a litigated action.[83]

(3) Want or Insufficiency of Notice of Proceedings

Want or insufficiency of the required notice of the action or intermediate proceedings therein is ground for opening or vacating a default judgment.

It is good ground for vacating or opening a default judgment that defendant had no notice of the action, either because of a failure to serve him with process, or because the process or service was fatally irregular or defective,[84] and this rule has been applied where an attempted service by publication

Failure to demand appointment of attorney

Statute providing that, when one party's attorney ceases to act as such, adverse party must, before any further proceedings may be had, by written notice require such party to appoint another attorney or to appear in person, has no application where adverse party has personal knowledge of withdrawal of her attorney and of setting of case for trial, and denial of plaintiff's motion to vacate judgment on cross complaint, because no written demand had been made on plaintiff by defendants to appoint attorney in lieu of attorney of record who had withdrawn, or to appear in person, was not abuse of discretion under such circumstances.—Savage v. Stokes, 28 P.2d 900, 54 Idaho 109—Smith-Nieland v. Reed, 231 P. 102, 39 Idaho 786.

Failure to serve proposed form of default

(1) Where defendants, while demurrers to complaint were pending before circuit court, knew that their original attorney had withdrawn but took no steps to have other counsel substituted or to notify plaintiffs of defendants' addresses, and defendants did not show that plaintiffs knew where defendants could be found, and defendants made no showing that default order and decree for plaintiffs were taken against defendants through their mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, refusal to set aside default on ground that plaintiffs did not serve copies of proposed forms thereof on defendants personally before order and decree were entered was not an abuse of discretion.—Merryman v. Colonial Realty Co., 120 P.2d 230, 168 Or. 12.

(2) Even if a firm of attorneys were attorneys for defendants when a default order was taken, failure to serve such form was immaterial in determining whether order and decree entered thereon should have been set aside, where defendants were served with a copy of order overruling demurrers and setting time for defendants to answer and with a copy of motion for default and setting time for hearing on merits.—Merryman v. Colonial Realty Co., supra.

Leaving at defendant's abode in his absence

Where copy of petition and process was left at defendant's most notorious place of abode while defendant was absent from county, and first discovered after default was entered, vacating default was held proper.—Carr-Lee Grocery Co. v. Brannen, 167 S.E. 536, 46 Ga.App. 225.

was fatally defective.[85] A judgment will not be set aside, however, for mere clerical errors, omissions, or irregularities in the process, not affecting the jurisdiction,[86] especially where defendant had actual notice of the commencement of the action,[87] and it has been held that a defendant who knew about the suit in time to make a defense, even though he was not served with summons, is not entitled to have a default judgment against him set aside.[88] Where the party knew of the claim a codefendant was making against him, and had actual notice that he was a codefendant, the court properly refused to vacate a judgment on the ground that the moving party did not know that a pleading such as a cross petition in which the claim was made had been filed.[89] A default will not be set aside where defendant's objections to process or service are waived by his voluntary appearance[90] or by his failure promptly to claim immunity from service made on him.[91] A default judgment will not be set aside on the ground of defective return of service where the return could have been amended so as truthfully to show good service.[92]

It has been held that parties to litigation are entitled to actual or constructive notice of every step to be taken, and, if anything is done affecting their rights without notice and they apply in a timely manner for redress, the trial court should grant it,[93]

Judgment against foreign corporation, having constructive notice of institution of suit but not actual notice until after rendition, was properly set aside under statute authorizing defense after judgment "upon good cause shown" but protecting bona fide purchasers.—Foster v. Service by little boy

Where decree recited that summons had been duly served on defendant, sheriff's return recited service on defendant, defendant admitted that summons was brought to him, allegedly by a little boy, and defendant was in court room while case was being tried, chancery court properly refused to set aside decree entered after defendant's default on ground that defendant was not properly served.—Rockamore v. Pembroke, 188 S.W.2d 616, 208 Ark. 995.

Actual notice of some, but not all, codefendants

Fact that one of many bondholders, against whom a default judgment was rendered without personal service, in a suit to foreclose a lien for materials furnished to the company issuing the bonds, had no actual notice of the action in time to appear and defend, did not entitle another of such bondholders, who had actual and timely notice, to have the judgment opened under statute, in the absence of any motion on behalf of the former or anything in the latter's motion indicating that it was made for or on the former's behalf or because of any authority or assignment from him.—Clarke v. Alien property custodian

Where judgment by default against a French banking corporation was entered, at a time when executive order authorizing alien property custodian to take measures in representing alien in a proceeding in interest of United States was entered without notice to custodian who was entitled under executive order to opportunity of contesting the action on being appointed corporation's representative, judgment was vacated on custodian's motion.—Metzger v. Credit Industrial D'Alsace and this is particularly true where a party failed to receive a notice to which he was entitled by established custom[94] or rule of court;[95] and a default judgment has been opened where defendant tendered a good defense and defendant's counsel was absent from court because he unwarrantedly relied on the clerk of the court or opposing counsel to give him timely notice of the trial day.[96] On the other hand, it has been held that, where a party has once been properly served with proper process, he is in court for every purpose connected with the action, and cannot have the judgment vacated for the failure to notify him of some intermediate step in the case;[97] and, where it is the duty of a party and his counsel to know when the case will be called for trial, it is no ground for setting aside a default judgment that neither was notified of the time the case was set for trial,[98] or that neither had any notice or knowledge that a term of court would be held or was being held on the date on which the judgment was rendered.[99] So, in the absence of statute requiring the clerk of the court to notify parties or attorneys as to the day on which a particular case is set for trial, a party who relies on the clerk so to notify him acts at his peril,[1] and failure of the clerk to give him such notice does not require the vacation of a judgment taken in his absence[2] even, it has been held, if the clerk promised to do so.[3] It is not error to refuse to set aside a default judgment for failure to notify defendant of the setting of the case after the filing of a formal answer where the answer expressly stated that defendant disclaimed interest in, or responsibility for, the suit.[4]

(4) Unauthorized, Inadvertent, Improvident, or Premature Entry

A default judgment may be set aside where entry thereof was unauthorized, inadvertent, improvident, or premature.

A default judgment may be set aside where it was entered by the clerk without any authority therefor,[5]

Et De Lorraine, 44 N.Y.S.2d 575, 181 Misc. 75.

Hearing set on condition of notice

Where hearing was set on condition that attorney for plaintiff notify attorneys for defendants, finding that one of the attorneys representing defendants was notified and that through some oversight, lapse of memory, or misunderstanding, he failed to notify defendants and their other attorneys, was insufficient to warrant the conclusion that they had notice of time and place of hearing, and hence judgment entered in their absence should be set aside.—Everett v. Johnson, 14 S.E.2d 520, 219 N.C. 540.

Failure to serve counterclaim

In view of statute, where defendant's answer containing counterclaim was not served on plaintiff, and no answer, demurrer, or reply was filed by plaintiff, court properly set aside judgment entered by default and inquiry on defendant's counterclaim.—Williams Fulgham Lumber Co. v. Failure of counsel to disclose location

Where defendant was kept in court by adjournments and files did not disclose location of defendant's counsel, refusal to set aside judgment taken without notice was not abuse of discretion.—O'Neill v. Hendrickson, 147 A. 721, 7 N.J.Misc. 1022.

Hearing of demurrer

In absence of fraud or mistake, it is not ground to vacate default that defendant or attorneys had no notice of hearing of demurrer, and granting time to further plead after overruling it, after which judgment was rendered.—Graham Production Co. v. Western Drilling Co., 251 P. 1004, 123 Okl. 79.

as where default was improperly entered for failure of plaintiff to answer a cross complaint which under the circumstances was unnecessary.[6] Also a judgment entered contrary to the course of the court by inadvertence, improvidence, mistake, or the like may be set aside.[7] A judgment may be set aside whether there was a total lack of authority to enter any judgment or only lack of authority to enter a particular judgment, when the entry of such a judgment was premature,[8] as where it was entered before expiration of the time for the filing of an answer,[9] before expiration of a continuance granted by the trial judge,[10] pending an application for a change of venue,[11] prior to the day on which the cause was docketed for trial,[12] or prior to the date reserved for decision on a demurrer.[13] A default judgment erroneously rendered where defendant was not in default may be vacated.[14]

Test
Whether statements of plaintiff's attorney misled and induced defendant to omit assertion of right is test whether statements amounted to constructive fraud warranting setting aside default judgment.—Kirby v. Hoeh, 21 P.2d 732, 94 Mont. 218.

Undue delay in bringing case to trial
Where advantage has been taken of defendant through undue delay in bringing a case to trial, a judgment

tion, as well as intentional or deliberate fraud.[17] The authority to set aside judgments for this cause is limited to cases where the fraud complained of was practiced in the very act of obtaining the judgment, and all cases of fraud which might have been used as a defense to defeat the action are excluded; the fraud must be extrinsic and collateral to the matter tried, and not a matter which was potentially in issue in the action.[18] The mere sending of statements by plaintiff to defendant after institution of the suit showing that the amount due was different and substantially less than that sued for does not amount to a representation that a judgment would not be taken for the amount alleged to be due in the petition.[19]

d. Agreement with, or Statement by, Party Taking Default or His Counsel

It is ground for vacating a default judgment that it was entered in violation of an explicit agreement or promise on which the party was entitled to rely.

A default which arises from reliance placed by a party or his counsel on assurances given him by the opposing party or counsel is excusable within the meaning of the law.[20] So, where there is an agreement between the parties or their counsel, such as an agreement that the case should be continued, or that time to plead should be extended, or that th action should be dismissed as the result of a compromise or settlement, or a promise of a party that he would not press the case to judgment, or a promise that the case would be heard at a time mutually to be agreed on, or other agreement in violation of which one party without notice to the other enters a default, or secures a judgment in his absence, it is good ground for vacating the judgment.[21] The agreement or promise must have been explicit, however, and of such a character that the party could rely on it and remain inactive without being thereby chargeable with negligence or lack of due diligence in guarding his own interests.[22]

An oral agreement, not communicated to the court, is entitled to little favor,[23] and when of uncertain and indefinite character will not afford ground for vacation of a judgment;[24] but relief may be granted on the basis of an oral agreement satisfactorily established,[25] although where a statute taken against him in his absence should be set aside and a new trial awarded.—Stansberry v. Dennison, 158 S.E. 716, 110 W.Va. 470.

Delay in giving notice of taking judgment

The alleged fact that no notice was given to defendants of the taking of a default judgment until it was too late to have default judgment set aside on motion was not ground for the setting aside of the default judgment.—Nicholson v. Thomas, 127 S.W.2d 155, 277 Ky. 760.

Failure to disclose facts to court

The alleged fact that assignee of subject matter of suit did not make disclosure of facts and status of case to the trial court would not authorize the setting aside of a default judgment.—Nicholson v. Thomas, 127 S.W.2d 155, 277 Ky. 760.

or rule of court requires agreements of the character relied on to be reduced to writing and filed, or communicated to the court, a mere oral agreement of the parties not brought to the notice of the court will not be sufficient to authorize the vacation of a judgment taken in violation of its terms.[26]

Where the agreement to withhold proceedings on the suit is terminated or expressly withdrawn, a default judgment subsequently taken will not be vacated.[27]

e. Statement or Order of Judge or Clerk

A default judgment may be opened if it is due to the inaccuracy of information given by, or reliance on statements of, the judge or clerk of court, although some cases hold that even official assurances will not relieve litigants from the duty of exercising vigilance in watching the progress of their cases.

Litigants are entitled to rely on statements by officials charged with the custody and control of papers and records relating to judicial proceedings in which they are interested, and about which information is sought; and accordingly a judgment by default will be opened if it is due to the inaccuracy of information given by, or reliance on statements of, such officials,[28] such as a judge[29] or the clerk of the court.[30] Accordingly if the court or an officer of the court by his conduct has misled parties as to the time cases will be tried, the absence of such parties may be excused,[31] although some cases hold that even official assurances will not relieve litigants or their counsel from the duty of exercising vigilance in watching the progress of their cases.[32]

f. Defense to Action

The existence of a complete defense available to the defendant before entry of a default judgment is not ground for opening or vacating the judgment, although the rule is otherwise as to a defense which arose after the default or of which the defendant was ignorant.

A default judgment regularly entered cannot be opened or vacated on defendant's motion on the ground of the existence of a complete defense which was available to defendant before entry of the judgment,[33] but the court may open or vacate the judgment to give the defaulted party the advantage of a defense which arose after the default[34] or of which he was ignorant.[35]

g. Error in Law

In the absence of a statute authorizing such relief, a default judgment ordinarily cannot be vacated by the trial court, after expiration of the term at which it is rendered, on the sole ground that it is erroneous in matter of law not going to the jurisdiction.

Unless, as shown supra subdivision b (1) of this section, the error is one going to the jurisdiction, a default judgment, in the absence of statute authorizing such relief, may not be vacated or set aside by the trial court, after expiration of the term at which it is rendered, on the sole ground that it is erroneous in matter of law,[36] the remedy in such case being by appeal.[37] A judgment may, however, be vacated when it improperly exceeds the relief prayed for, or is rendered for an amount in excess of that claimed in the writ or declaration.[38]

h. Error or Mistake of Fact

Error or mistake of fact going to the validity or regularity of the judgment, such as furnished ground for the writ of error coram nobis at common law, is ground for opening or vacating a default judgment.

Error or mistake of fact going to the validity or regularity of the judgment, such as furnished ground for the writ of error coram nobis at common law, is ground for opening or vacating a default judgment.[39] Errors in fact within this rule are errors in material matters, prejudicial to the judgment debtor, and which, if known, would have prevented rendition of the judgment,[40] and which do not appear on the face of the record.[41]

"Clerical error"
Clerk's placing of case, pleadings in which were not advanced for one year, on calendar without notice, was "clerical error" authorizing vacation of judgment dismissing action for want of appearance within rule.—New England Furniture & Carpet Co. v. Willcuts, D.C.Minn., 55 F.2d 983.

Ignorance of want of notice
Where court was unaware at time of entering default and judgment thereon that notice of such proceedings had not been served on defendant or his attorney, court properly set the judgment aside on ground of error of fact unknown to the court when judgment was rendered.—Lusk v. Bluhm, 58 N.E.2d 135, 321 Ill.App. 349.

34 C.J. p 290 note 59.

Dismissal of other defendants without notice was not an error of fact within text rule.—McNulty v. White, 248 Ill.App. 572.

Pendency of another action
Where at time plaintiff obtained default judgment for purchase price of a fur coat, there was withheld from the court the information that purchaser's action in small claims court against plaintiff to recover payments made on the coat had been continued that same day, setting aside the default judgment even after expiration of the term was proper.—Marvin's Credit v. Kitching, D. C.Mun.App., 34 A.2d 866.

41. Ill.—Sherman & Ellis v. Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, 259 Ill.App. 453.

in the complaint,[42] particularly where the complaint did not allege that plaintiffs were ignorant of the name of such defendant and plaintiffs did not seek before entry of default judgment to amend the complaint to show that movant was the party sued as "John Doe."[43] Inasmuch as nonjoinder of a comaker or surety is a curable defect, and inasmuch as in a suit against joint or joint and several obligors, where some are not served, the judgment is good as against those served, there is no error in overruling a motion to set aside the judgment on allegation and proof of such defects.[44]

j. Objections as to Pleadings

A default judgment will not be set aside because of mere defects or insufficiency in the pleadings, although failure of the declaration or complaint to state a cause of action is ground for vacating a default judgment.

A default judgment will not be set aside because of defects or insufficiency in the pleadings,[45] especially where the alleged fault is amendable[46] or the facts alleged are sufficient to challenge the attention of the court having jurisdiction of the subject matter and parties.[47] It has been held, however, that failure of the declaration or complaint to state a cause of action is ground for vacating a default judgment.[48] A default judgment rendered on a petition which shows on its face that the alleged cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations may, it has been held, be set aside for irregularity;[49] but, on the other hand, the view has been taken that no ground to set aside the judgment exists in such case, since such a petition does not fail to set out a cause of action.[50]

Default in service. Plaintiff suing defendant individually and as executor, but not serving the complaint in both actions, may have his default opened and the actions consolidated.[51]

k. Ignorance or Illiteracy

A party's ignorance or illiteracy, standing alone, is no excuse for a default, although such ignorance in connection with other circumstances may move the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to vacate a default judgment.

Petition stating prima facie cause of action

In motion to vacate default judgment after expiration of term at which judgment was rendered, defendant cannot question sufficiency of petition, allegations of which state prima facie cause of action.—Royse v. Grage, 28 P.2d 732, 138 Kan. 779.

There is a difference between a defective statement of a good cause of action and a statement of no cause of action where the complaint is wholly insufficient to make out a cause of action. A judgment by default on the former is erroneous and must be appealed from; the latter is irregular and can be set aside within a reasonable time where merit is shown and there is no laches.—Hood ex rel. Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart, 184 S.E. 36, 209 N.C. 424.

Failure to file exhibits

Where the basis of plaintiff's action consisted of two exhibits said to have been filed therewith, and his petition did not purport to copy or use the language of either one of those exhibits, and plaintiff had never filed either one of them, and it appeared that attorney for defendants moved the court to require plaintiff to file with his petition the exhibits referred to therein, the court abused its discretion in overruling motion to set aside default judgment.—Miller v. Sachs, 258 S.W. 84, 201 Ky. 630.

Default judgment for want of affidavit of defense will be opened if plaintiff's statement was not sufficient to call for such affidavit.—Richey v. Gibboney, 34 A.2d 913, 154 Pa.Super. 1—Nikulnikoff v. Orthodox Russian Church of St. Andrew, Inc., 97 Pa.Super. 291—Cadwallader v. Firestone, Pa.Com.Pl., 7 Fay.L.J. 259.

Default judgment properly set aside

A default judgment against individual defendants doing business as association, not named in caption of summons and complaint, or charged in complaint, as defendant, was properly set aside as against contention that lack of partnership or common name in such caption could not nullify judgment, as attack on judgment was based on entire absence of material allegations in body of complaint, not merely words in caption.—Burns v. Downs, 108 P.2d 953, 42 Cal.App.2d 322.

of the law[53] or rules of court,[54] is not a sufficient excuse for failure to plead or for a default. So the illiteracy of a defendant, or ignorance of the English language, of the course of judicial procedure, or of his rights and duties, will furnish no excuse for failing to defend the action, or justify the vacation of the judgment, where he at least knew that he had been sued, and neglected to ask information or advice from others.[55] Where, however, defendant has failed to answer because of ignorance of the law, and it is properly shown that he has a meritorious defense, and that no harm has resulted or will result, the default judgment may, in the discretion of the court, be vacated.[56]

l. Absence of Party or Counsel

The mere unexcused absence of a party or his counsel from the trial is not ground for opening or setting aside a default judgment, although such relief may be granted on a showing of sufficient excuse for the absence.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise,[57] the mere fact that a party was absent from the trial is no cause for opening or setting aside a default judgment where his absence is not excused or shown to have been unavoidable.[58] Also the mere absence of one's attorney at the time of the trial is no cause for opening or setting aside a default judgment,[59] and relief will not be granted for this reason unless counsel was prevented from appearing by accident, mistake, or other reasonable cause.[60] It has been considered a sufficient excuse that the absent attorney was engaged at the time in trying a case in another court,[61] or that he was

Tolerance of court in enforcing attendance

With respect to right to set aside a default judgment, generally courts recognize that counsel are at times unable to transact business in court at the particular time required on account of urgent business or on account of being busily engaged with other legal matters, and under such a showing they are tolerant in enforcing attendance of counsel.—United Taxi Co. v. Dilworth, 20 N.E.2d 699, 106 Ind.App. 627.

delayed by obstruction to travel,[62] or even that the multiplicity and pressure of his professional engagements prevented him from giving attention to the case.[63]

On the other hand it has been held to be no excuse that the attorney was absent because of trying another case in another court where he took insufficient steps to notify the other party and the court of the reason for his absence,[64] and many courts have refused to accept the excuse that the attorney was detained elsewhere by important business, even when it was of a public character, such as his attendance on the legislature, of which he was a member.[65] According to some cases, if the attorney is detained on his way to the place of trial, he should telephone or telegraph to the judge, and ask him to have the case held;[66] and one seeking to vacate a judgment obtained in his absence must show not only good excuse for his absence, but also that he was unable to notify the court thereof.[67] A judgment entered during the absence of a party and his counsel may be set aside where such absence was due to the mistake, neglect, or omission of the clerk of the court in placing the case on a docket to which it did not belong without notice to counsel and then not notifying them of the assignment of the case for trial.[68]

m. Illness or Death

The illness of a party or his close relative, the illness or death of an attorney or his close relative, or the illness of a material and necessary witness is a sufficient excuse for a default, provided the alleged consequence thereof could not have been prevented or obviated by the exercise of due care or diligence.

Illness is not a sufficient excuse for a default where the exercise of due care or diligence would have prevented or obviated the alleged consequences of such illness.[69] If a party is prevented by sickness from preparing his case or attending the trial, and the circumstances are such that his personal attention and presence are necessary to the due protection of his rights, a default judgment against him may be set aside;[70] and default judgments have been opened or vacated largely, if not altogether, on the ground of serious illness of a close relative actually preventing attendance of the party.[71] It is otherwise where the party's interests were, or could have been, adequately protected by attorney or agent without the personal presence or attention of the party.[72]

ty's counsel, so severe as to prevent him from appearing and trying the case, is good ground for vacating a default judgment, provided such party did not know of it in time to retain other counsel or was prevented in some other way from doing so;[73] otherwise such illness of counsel is not ground for vacating the judgment.[74] The same rule applies in the case of the illness of a member of the attorney's family, or a near relative, withdrawing his attention from professional business and leaving the client without legal aid and without opportunity to retain other counsel.[75] Death of one's attorney may be ground for vacating a default judgment.[76]

der to obtain relief under statutes authorizing it in such cases, the default judgment from which relief is sought must be valid and regular in all respects,[79] although, as shown supra subdivision b of this section, relief from void or irregular default judgments may be had in proper cases. The mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect referred to in such statutes does not apply only to the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect of the attorney for one of the parties, but also applies to that of the parties themselves;[80] and such statutes do not apply to, or afford relief from, errors of law committed by the court.[81] The mistake or neglect relied on as a basis for relief, to be sufficient, must be such as may be expected on the part of a reasonably prudent person situated as was the party against whom the judgment was entered.[82]

(a) In General

A default judgment may be opened or vacated where the appearance of a party or his pleading was prevented by mistake, particularly a mistake of fact, although under some circumstances a mistake of law may afford sufficient basis for the relief.

A default may be excused and a default judgment opened or vacated where the appearance of the party or his pleading was prevented by mistake.[83] To vacate a default judgment, it is generally incumbent on the defaulted party to show that his mistake was one of fact, and not of law,[84] but in some jurisdictions it has been held that, if a mistake of law is a reasonable one under the facts as they are made to appear, the neglect to file an answer because of the belief entertained is at least excusable.[85] According to some authorities, the mistake contemplated by statutes relating to relief from default judgments is such as might be expected on the part of a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances.[86] If a statute gives the right to open or vacate a judgment taken against a party through "his" mistake, no mistake made by any other person will justify this action.[87]

(b) As to Cause of Action or Defense

A default suffered because of a reasonable and excusable misapprehension as to the cause of action or defense may be set aside.

Where a party suffers a default judgment because of a reasonable and excusable misapprehension as to the cause of action or defense, the judgment should be set aside,[88] and this has been held to be the rule even though the misapprehension was as to the law.[89]

(c) As to Time or Place of Appearance or Trial

A party may have a default judgment opened or set aside when he has made an honest and excusable mistake as to the time or place for appearance, pleading, or trial.

A party may have a default judgment opened or set aside when he has made an honest and excusable mistake as to the time when he was required to plead or answer[90] or as to the time of trial,[91] but not where the mistake was the result of his own heedlessness or lack of due attention and care.[92] In view of a court rule that all cases at issue on the merits at the commencement of a term shall stand for trial on the first day of the term, a party is not warranted in assuming that his case would not be reached on that day, and his failure to appear for trial on that day is not ground for vacating a decree taken in his absence.[93]

Where an inexperienced suitor attempted to comply with a summons by appearing in the office of plaintiff's attorney, understanding such appearance to be sufficient, a default judgment may be opened on the ground that his failure to appear was due to excusable neglect, other requisites being present.[94]

(d) As to Process

A default judgment may be vacated where the defendant's failure to appear was due to an excusably mistaken belief as to process.

A default judgment may be vacated where defendant's failure to appear was due to an excusably mistaken belief that no process had been served[95] or where defendant thought the summons

Where return of service was not filed as required by statute, defendant's attorney was justified in assuming that no service had been made within fifteen-day period.—Reynolds' v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., 243 P. 576, 75 Mont. 332.

served on him was for his employer[96] or was misled by a belief that the process was in a different suit.[97] Where defendant reasonably entertained a belief that the service of process was invalid, a default judgment based on failure to answer will be set aside under the statutory rule obtaining in some jurisdictions that a reasonable mistake of law is excusable,[98] but, on the other hand, it has been held that relief will not be granted merely because defendant, through ignorance of the law, believed that the process served was invalid,[99] and the discretion of the trial court in refusing to vacate a judgment on failure of defendant to appear where defendant was erroneously advised that the service was not good has been held properly exercised.[1]

(e) As to Employment of Counsel

A party ordinarily cannot procure the setting aside of a default judgment against him on the ground of his mistaken belief that he had retained an attorney to protect his interests, but the circumstances of the case may warrant the exercise of the court's discretion in granting the relief.

A party ordinarily cannot procure the setting aside of a default judgment against him on the ground of his mistaken belief that he had retained an attorney to protect his interests;[2] but there are cases of this kind where the court in the exercise of its discretion has granted relief.[3] Where the mistake was as to the employment of counsel by a person on whom defendant justifiably relied to attend to that matter, it may furnish cause for vacating the judgment.[4]

(3) Surprise

In a number of jurisdictions a default may be excused and a default judgment opened or set aside where the appearance of the party or his pleading was prevented by surprise.

In a number of jurisdictions a default may be excused and a default judgment opened or set aside where the appearance of the party or his pleading was prevented by surprise,[5] and there is authority holding that, before a judgment by default regularly entered will be opened for the purpose of interposing a defense, the one seeking to invoke the aid of the court must establish surprise.[6] There can be no fixed formula by which the necessary element of surprise may be measured in every case,[7] but the extenuating factors of each particular situation must be the ultimate determinants.[8] Neglect of an attorney to file a pleading within the time allowed by law may fairly be considered a surprise on his client warranting the vacation of a default judgment against the latter.[9]

(4) Inadvertence

A default judgment inadvertently permitted may be opened or set aside.

The trial court has great latitude in relieving a party from a default judgment inadvertently permitted.[10] To be ground for relief, however, the inadvertence must be based on more than mere forgetfulness,[11] and must be such as might be expected on the part of a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances.[12]

Inadvertence of insurance carrier

In trespass to recover damages for injuries to one struck by defendant's automobile, trial court did not abuse discretion in opening default judgment on prompt application, where default occurred through no neglect of defendant or his counsel, but through inadvertence of defendant's insurance carrier.—Scott v. McEwing, 10 A.2d 436, 337 Pa. 273, 126 A.L.R. 367.

Inadvertence as to process served

Excusable neglect as ground for opening or vacating judgments generally see supra § 280.

The word "neglect," as in civil procedure rule authorizing court to set aside default for excusable neglect, means omission of proper attention, disregard of duty from indifference or willfulness, failure to do, use, or heed anything, and negligence. —Booth v. Central States Mut. Ins Ass'n, 15 N.W.2d 893, 235 Iowa 5.

Carelessness and negligence are not akin to "excusable neglect" specified by statute as grounds for vacating default judgment.—Doyle v. Rice Ranch Oil Co., 81 P.2d 980, 28 Cal.App.2d 18.

Defendant's failure to answer trover suit, because he was informed different proceeding would have to be filed, was not excusable neglect. —Coker v. Hison, 151 S.E. 682, 40 Ga.App. 835.

Failure to notify general manager or attorney

The president of board of directors of power and irrigation district and superintendent of power and irrigation were at fault in not notifying district's general manager

on the part of the person or official charged with the duty of responding to the legal process in due time,[14] and is such as might be expected on the part of a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances;[15] utter indifference and inattention to business is not excusable neglect,[16] and failure to pay personal attention to the case is inexcusable negligence.[17] Thus, although under the peculiar circumstances of the particular case a different holding may be required,[18] as a general rule, where service of process has been made on a duly appointed agent who fails to notify his principal through mere carelessness, such a showing does not constitute excusable neglect,[19] but constitutes inexcusable neglect,[20] and the same rule applies where the agent has been made so by law rather than by appointment.[21]

Reliance on the assurance of one not a party to the action that he will take care of the matter does not show such excusable neglect as would require the trial court to set aside a default,[22] although the circumstances of the particular case may be such as to warrant the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to grant the relief.[23] Negligence of defendant's employee in mislaying a summons or failing timely to notify defendant that he was served has under varying circumstances been held to constitute[24] or not to constitute[25] sufficient grounds for vacating a default judgment. Neglect attributable to a miscarriage of the mails may be excusable,[26] although the circumstances of the case may be such as to warrant a denial of relief.[27]

Defendant's neglect may be excusable where default was entered while his proposal for settlement was pending,[28] or while he believed negotiations for a settlement were pending,[29] or that the action against him had been ended in fact by virtue of a compromise.[30] Conduct of defendant in informing his attorney that the facts alleged in the complaint were true when in fact they were not is inexcusable neglect and no ground for setting aside a judgment for plaintiff in an undefended action.[31]

(b) Diligence Required of Suitors

Since inexcusable negligence imputable to a party seeking to open or set aside a default judgment may defeat the application, such a party must have been dili-or attorney that action was pending against the district, but their conduct was not so inexcusable as to defeat the district's right to a trial of the issues on the merits, and hence default judgment against the district would be set aside on motion of district.—Barney v. Platte Valley Public Power & Irr. Dist., Neb., 23 N.W.2d 335.

Judgment taken against petitioner, after petitioner failed timely to amend petition, demurrer to which was sustained, was within purview of statute authorizing relief from judgment taken through excusable neglect, and order vacating judgment was not clear abuse of trial court's discretion.—Greenamyer v. Board of Trustees of Lugo Elementary School Dist. in Los Angeles County, 2 P.2d 848, 116 Cal.App. 319.

Service on corporation commission
Where service of process in suit against benefit insurance company was made on chairman of corporation commission, as authorized by statute, proof that summons was placed in files of the commission, and nothing further done to advise defendant company of the summons, did not establish "excusable neglect", so as to authorize setting aside default judgment.—Postal Benefit Ins. degree of neglect may be held excusable,[35] and it has been held, considering the language of controlling statutes and the circumstances of their enactment, that a party's mere negligence is not fatal to the exercise of discretion to vacate a final judgment against him pursuant to an interlocutory judgment of default.[36] During the term at which it was rendered, moreover, a default judgment may be vacated in the discretion of the court notwithstanding defendant's negligence.[37]

A person of mature years and judgment may not idly ignore a summons to defend an action,[38] and the courts will seldom relieve one who has disregarded the command of a writ willfully[39] or through mere inattention or neglect[40] or sheer forgetfulness,[41] or who ignores a notice that on a specified date plaintiff will apply for a default judgment,[42] or who willfully slumbers on his rights and makes no effort to protect himself.[43] So a party will not be relieved from a judgment taken against him with his knowledge and on his willful default,[44] as where the default was suffered as a part of a policy of intentional delay on the part of defendant,[45] or where the judgment was not due to an oversight, but was the result of a decision, after deliberation, not to defend,[46] although thereafter he changes his mind and desires to defend because of changing circumstances.[47]

Furthermore, in order to be able to set aside a judgment for excusable neglect, a party must give the litigation such attention as a man of ordinary prudence usually bestows on important business.[48]

Mislaying summons and complaint

Denial of motion to open default judgment on ground that summons and complaint were mislaid in the confusion of moving and forgotten was not an abuse of discretion.—Whipple v. Mahler, 10 N.W.2d 771, 215 Minn. 578.

Preoccupation with other matters

Fact that original notice was served on defendant's president at his residence while he was working in yard during afternoon after defendant's office was closed, and facts that his duties as president were principally confined to defendant's production and that he had nothing to do with its claim department, and fact that he devoted much time to supervision of drives for war bond sales, made over three months after such service, were not reasonable excuses for defendant's default and hence afforded no basis for its motion to set aside default on ground of excusable neglect.—Booth v. Thus he must, unless he means to try his own case, retain an attorney practicing in the particular court,[49] and see that the attorney understands and accepts the retainer,[50] and in case his counsel dies, or withdraws, or is discharged from the case he must promptly engage another.[51] It is the duty of a party to take account of the time and place of holding court, the position of the case on the calendar, and the state of the calendar,[52] and to keep himself informed of the progress of the case, when it is set for trial, or when it is likely to be reached,[53] and then to attend court prepared to establish his case,[54] but it has been held that a client may rely on his counsel to inform him as to the time the case will be set for trial and to advise him as to all matters necessary to a proper presentation of the case to the court.[55]

(a) In General

Generally a default judgment may be opened or vacated for the excusable, but not the inexcusable, neglect or surprise, or mistake or oversight of counsel for the party against whom the default was taken.

The general rule is that a default judgment may be opened or vacated for the excusable neglect or surprise[56] or mistake or oversight[57] of counsel for the party against whom the default was taken. The law does not look with favor, however, on setting aside defaults resulting from inexcusable inadvertence, surprise, or neglect of attorneys in the performance of their duties to their clients.[58] Such failure on the part of attorneys ordinarily is imputable to their clients, unless their default can be excused as being the result of accident or surprise, that which ordinary prudence on their part could not have avoided.[59] So it has been said that mistakes of one's counsel, unaccompanied by fraud, accident, or improper conduct of the opposite side, are not ground for setting aside a judgment by de-

One may be stupid or ignorant, or otherwise under disability so as not to be capable of exercising reasonable care and diligence with respect to an action brought against him in court, and yet be found by the court, even after judgment has been entered against him, to have such a meritorious defence as to be the victim of injustice if the judgment is allowed to stand. In such circumstances, the law does not prevent remedial action."—Manzi v. Carlson, 180 N.E. 134, 137, 278 Mass. 267.

fault.[60] In the determination of motions to set aside defaults, mistakes of attorneys and those of parties to the action are to be measured by the same rules.[61]

(b) Negligence

Although negligence of counsel does not necessarily bar relief, generally a client cannot be relieved from a default judgment taken against him in consequence of the neglect, carelessness, forgetfulness, or inattention of his attorney unless such neglect was excusable under the circumstances.

As a general rule, the negligence of an attorney is imputable to his client, and the latter cannot be relieved from a default judgment taken against him in consequence of the neglect, carelessness, forgetfulness, or inattention of the former[62] unless the neglect was excusable under the circumstances.[63] This rule applies where the negligence of

Reliance on rule of court

Where the rules of a trial court made every Monday law day, on which all matters then pending would be disposed of, counsel is warranted in relying on that rule and in presuming that it will be followed unless informed to the contrary. —Garner v. Towler, 213 P. 390, 25 Ariz. 101.

Reliance on official records

Attorney is justified in relying on official records showing condition of case pending in court, and court should relieve client from effect of error in record.—Reynolds v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., 243 P. 576, 75 Mont. 332.

Attorney recently discharged from army

In view of difficulties facing an attorney recently discharged from army in picking up threads of his practice, some latitude should be extended in passing on such attorney's motion to open default judgment against his client entered after expiration of time to serve pleading.—Cunningham v. Port Washington Synagogue, 56 N.Y.S.2d 786.

the attorney consisted in his failure to enter an appearance or file a pleading in due season,[64] and also where it consisted of a failure to pursue and follow up the case with due care and watchfulness,[65] or where, being present in court, he refused to proceed with the trial and failed to avail himself of the privileges which the law affords to him in such case.[66]

Negligence or misconduct of the petitioner's attorney, however, does not necessarily bar a petition to vacate a judgment,[67] and a considerable number of cases have held that, where the party himself has not been guilty of negligence, a judgment against him may be set aside because it was obtained through the negligence of his counsel[68] if it can be done without prejudicing the rights of the other

Negligence of co-counsel named as compliment

The alleged negligence of person who had been admitted to practice law and whose name appeared on some of pleadings as of counsel for defendants did not preclude them from having set aside default decree entered against them without knowledge of their counsel, where it appeared that such person's name had been inserted merely as a compliment and that he actually had no responsibility for any matters connected with case.—Lunt v. party,[69] that is, without loss to such other party other than that which might result from establishing the claim or defense of the party applying.[70] Furthermore, under some statutes a default is required to be set aside when taken against a party otherwise without default through the neglect or failure of his attorney to file or serve any paper within the time limited therefor,[71] although such statutes do not apply where the party asking for relief was not represented by attorney at the time of the default and the default was not taken by reason of the negligence of counsel.[72] The negligence of an attorney may be excusable when attributable to an honest mistake, an accident, or any cause which is not incompatible with proper diligence on his part, and in these circumstances it will be proper to set aside or open a default judgment taken in consequence thereof.[73] The fact that an attorney was lulled into a sense of security by continued negotiations between the parties for settling the case out of court has been held a sufficiently reasonable excuse for failure to file an answer,[74] but there is authority holding that mere discussion by litigants of settlement pending action does not excuse failure to plead.[75]

In any case, however, the client himself must be free from fault; negligence of his counsel is not excusable negligence for which a judgment will be set aside if the client wholly neglected the case and took no interest in the issue,[76] even though fraud reasonably discoverable exists.[77] He must show that he employed counsel practicing habitually in the particular court, or who specially agreed to attend to the case,[78] and the relief will not be granted on this ground where to do so would delay trial of the cause to the consequent injury of the party not in default.[79] Where an attorney is employed simply to retain counsel to appear at another place, he is a mere agent and his negligence is imputable to his client.[80]

(c) Mistake as to Time or Place of Appearance or Trial

A default judgment may be opened or vacated for excusable mistake of counsel as to time or place of appearance or trial.

(d) Ignorance or Mistake of Law

While ignorance of the law on the part of an attorney ordinarily is not sufficient ground for setting aside a default judgment, a party may, in a proper case, be granted relief notwithstanding an attorney's mistake of law.

Ignorance of the law on the part of an attorney ordinarily is not sufficient ground for setting aside a default judgment,[87] but the mere fact that an attorney erroneously stated a proposition of law in court, which error would not justify setting aside a default judgment, does not bar him from asserting other grounds for setting aside the default which the court might find sufficient.[88] Furthermore, the court, in its discretion, may grant relief from an attorney's mistake of law as to the legal effect of an order[89] or as to the proper procedure.[90]

(e) Erroneous Advice

The fact that a default judgment was suffered by a party in consequence of receiving erroneous advice from his attorney is generally no ground for setting aside the judgment, although under the facts of the particular case relief may be justified on this ground.

The responsibility of a person of mature years and judgment is independent of that of the attorney by whom he is advised.[91] So it is generally held not to be good ground for setting aside a default judgment that it was suffered by the party in consequence of receiving erroneous advice from his attorney as to the necessity of making a defense or as to the validity of the defense;[92] but under the facts of a particular case relief may be justified on this ground.[93]

(f) Misconduct

A default judgment may be set aside where it was obtained through the misconduct of the party's attorney or because of his abandonment of, or withdrawal from, the case without timely notice to his client.

A default judgment may be set aside where it was obtained through the misconduct of the party's attorney.[94] Abandonment of, or withdrawal from,

Refusal to accept notice of trial
Where defendant's attorney of record refused to accept notice of trial, stating that he intended to withdraw from the case, and never notified defendant that the case had been noticed or set for trial, and defendant received no information of the proposed trial from any source, a judgment rendered in the absence of defendant should be vacated.—Calkins v. Smalley, 294 P. 534, 88 Colo. 227.

the case by an attorney without timely notice to his client has been held sufficient ground for vacating a resulting default judgment,[95] although relief on such ground has been denied in view of the circumstances of the particular case.[96]

(g) Misunderstanding

The fact that a default judgment was the consequence of a genuine, accidental, and excusable misunderstanding of counsel is ground for opening or vacating it.

A default judgment may be opened or set aside where the default occurred when the party's counsel, who was guilty of no negligence or omission of duty to his client, failed, because of a genuine and accidental misunderstanding, to perform an act which would otherwise have been performed,[97] and this rule applies where the misunderstanding was between the party and his counsel,[98] between opposing counsel,[99] or between counsel and the court,[1] or where, without fault on their part, counsel were misled by the record.[2] In all such cases, however, in order that the judgment may be set aside, it is necessary that the mistake shall be shown to be excusable.[3]

(7) Unavoidable Casualty or Misfortune

Under some statutes a default may be excused and a default judgment opened or vacated where the appearance of a party or his pleading was prevented by unavoidable casualty or misfortune, which is defined as that which could not have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence or human prudence or foresight, and which does not exist where the complaining party was himself guilty of negligence in allowing the default judgment to be taken.

Under statutes in some jurisdictions a default may be excused and a default judgment opened or vacated where the appearance of the party or his pleading was prevented by unavoidable casualty or misfortune.[4] While it has been said that such statutes are in derogation, not only of the common law, but of the policy of holding judgments final after the close of the term,[5] on the other hand, the view has been taken that they are consistent with the fundamental rule that each case should be tried on the merits, and a strict construction of the word "unavoidable" as used therein will not be countenanced.[6] A casualty within the statutes is something in the nature of an accident,[7] something unexpected;[8] it is in the nature of a misfortune, and in a sense the two words are legally synonymous.[9] Forgetfulness is not in and of itself a misfortune; if anything, it is the basis of the misfortune.[10] While there is some question as to whether the word "unavoidable" in the statutory phrase "unavoidable casualty or misfortune" applies to the word "misfortune" as it does to "casualty,"[11] that has been held to be the significance and legal effect of the word as it stands alone.[12] Unavoidable casualty or misfortune is distinguished from a mere ordinary casualty or misfortune;[13] it is such casualty or misfortune as could not have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence[14] or human prudence or foresight;[15] it is an event or casualty happening against the will and without the negligence or default of a party,[16] and it does not exist where the complaining party was himself guilty of negligence in allowing the default judgment to be taken.[17]

The lack of diligence of a party or his attorney,[18] an attorney's negligence,[19] or the mere failure of an attorney to follow his client's instructions[20] is not unavoidable casualty or misfortune within the statute. Unavoidable casualty may be based on mistake of counsel,[21] but a mistake of counsel in thinking that he had an agreement with opposing counsel is not unavoidable casualty.[22] The mere absence of employed counsel from court because of other business engagements is not such an unavoidable casualty as will necessarily entitle the defaulting party to a new trial,[23] although the court in its discretion may vacate a judgment for this reason.[24]

The act of an attorney in abandoning his client's case without notice to the latter, and in permitting a default judgment to be rendered against his client without his knowledge or consent, has been held

Negligence of agent

Physician carrying indemnity insurance against suits for malpractice, who referred defense of suit to insurance carrier, made insurance company his agent for conducting defense, and negligence of company's adjuster in failing to transmit information concerning suit to company's attorneys was imputed to physician on physician's application to set aside default judgment against him, and physician was not entitled to have default judgment set aside for "unavoidable casualty or misfortune."—Leslie v. Attendance on legislature

Facts that defendant's attorney depended on plaintiff's attorney for information regarding filing of action, and that after action was filed defendant's attorney became member of state legislature, and by reason thereof was absent from office for period of three months, unable to remain in contact with source of information which would have apprised him of pendency of action, did not constitute unavoidable casualty or misfortune, so as to entitle defendant to have judgment vacated.—Royse v. Grage, 42 P.2d 942, 141 Kan. 702.

to constitute unavoidable casualty or misfortune,[25] but there is also authority apparently to the contrary.[26] Sickness which prevents an attorney from being in attendance on the court is an unavoidable casualty,[27] whether it be sickness of the attorney himself[28] or of members of his family;[29] but the illness of defendant is not such unavoidable casualty or misfortune as will entitle him to vacation of the judgment where he was able to attend to the case at his home and his physical presence either at the courthouse or at his attorney's office was not required.[30] A misunderstanding between opposing counsel and the defaulted party as to the intent of the former to press the suit may constitute unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing defendant from appearing and defending.[31] Loss or miscarriage of mail may constitute unavoidable casualty or misfortune;[32] but, where service of process has been made on a duly appointed statutory agent who fails to notify his principal through mere carelessness, such a showing does not constitute unavoidable casualty or misfortune.[33]

o. Other Grounds

Various matters have been held to constitute, or not to constitute, grounds for opening or vacating default judgments.

In addition to those discussed supra subdivisions b-n of this section, miscellaneous other matters have been held to constitute[34] or not to constitute[35] grounds for opening or vacating default judgments.

Advice of sheriff. It is no ground for vacating a default judgment that the sheriff, in delivering the summons, advised defendant that it would not be necessary for him to appear.[36]

Conduct of codefendant. Defendant's reliance on the promise of a codefendant to settle or defend the cause of action in behalf of all defendants is not in itself sufficient to require the court to vacate a default judgment against defendant,[37] although under the circumstances of the particular case such relief may be warranted.[38]

Furtherance of justice. Courts may not legally

Attorney's abandonment of, or withdrawal from, case as ground for opening or vacating default judgment generally see supra subdivision n (6) (f) of this section.

Withdrawal of attorney
An attorney's act in abandoning case and withdrawing therefrom without notice to client, thus permitting default judgment to be rendered against client without client's knowledge and consent, is "unavoidable casualty and misfortune" which justifies setting such judgment aside; and, where defendants' attorney did not formally withdraw, but without notice to clients stated to court that clients had no defense, this amounted to withdrawal as attorney and abandonment of clients' interests within rule.—Grayson v. set aside a judgment by default confirmed in strict conformity with the requirements of the law solely on the alleged ground that such action would be in furtherance of justice where defendant has been properly cited.[39] The action of the trial court in setting aside an order adjudging defendant in default has been upheld, however, under the broad power of the court to modify, set aside, or vacate any order previously made where to do so would be, in the opinion of the court, to further the principles of justice and rights;[40] and, as shown supra subdivision a of this section whether the ends of justice will be furthered thereby is a matter for consideration on a motion to set aside a default judgment made at the same term. The removal of a default by judicial action is proper where there is a substantial defense, and where it is necessary for the promotion of justice.[41]

Good cause or adventitious circumstances. Under some statutes a default judgment may be vacated on a showing of "good cause"[42] or some "adventitious circumstance" beyond the control of the party.[43]

§ 335. Judgment on Constructive Service

In accordance with express statutory provisions which are liberally construed, a defendant who has been only constructively served by publication of summons, and against whom a judgment is given by default, may appear and have the judgment vacated and be admitted to defend the action, within a limited period of time.

Under express statutes in a number of jurisdictions, a defendant, or a nonresident defendant, who has been only constructively served by publication of summons, and against whom a judgment is given by default, may appear and have the judgment vacated and be admitted to defend the action, within a limited time after the rendition of the judgment or after receiving notice of it.[44] Such statutes are remedial, and should be construed liberally so as to advance the remedy,[45] and the showing defendant is required to make should not be unnecessarily strict.[46] Under some statutes actual knowledge of the pending action has been held not to preclude defendant from subsequently moving to reopen the judgment;[47] but generally a defendant may not avail himself of these statutes, although constructively summoned, if he had actual knowledge or notice of the action in time to make his defense,[48] or if he appeared in the action,[49] and, of course, such statutes do not apply where defendant was personally served, and thereafter suffered a default.[50]

Defendant need not present any excuse for his failure to appear except the fact that he was not personally served with the summons.[51] While some of this class of statutes in terms require "cause" or "good cause" to be shown,[52] the existence of a meritorious defense, together with want of notice of the action in time to present it, is sufficient "cause" within the meaning of the statute.[53] No irregularity in the proceedings or defect in the judgment need be shown.[54] The application presupposes the validity of the judgment by default, and the regularity of the proceeding may not be attacked.[55]

Defendant is not precluded from having the judgment reopened by entering a general appearance and attaching a cross petition to his motion.[56]

a. In General

Subject to some exceptions, as where the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, an application to open or vacate a default judgment must generally be supported by a showing that the applicant has a meritorious defense.

As a general rule, a judgment by default will not be opened or vacated unless defendant shows that he has a meritorious defense to the action.[57] It

Defendant is not required to show affirmatively anything more than that he has a good defense on the merits, but, if it appears from the record that defendant has deliberately prevented personal service of summons on him, there is not "good cause" within statute and trial court does not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial.—Perrin v. must appear that a retrial will result in a judgment different from the one sought to be vacated.[58] The existence of a meritorious defense is an express or implied condition of relief under some of the statutes providing for the opening or vacating of default judgments taken on constructive service of process,[59] but such a showing is not necessary under all of the statutes.[60]

Exceptions to the rule have been made in a variety of cases.[61] A meritorious defense need not be shown where the application to open or vacate the default judgment is made during the judgment term;[62] but there is also authority to the contrary.[63] It has been held that a meritorious defense need not be shown where the judgment is void,[64] or at least where it is void on the face of the rec-

Default order and judgment distinguished

Under the statutes, the distinction between an order vacating a default judgment and an order vacating a default order entered before judgment is that in the former the prerequisite is showing a meritorious defense, while in the latter only good and sufficient cause need be set out.—Johnston v. Constructive service

A defendant who was constructively served had right under statute to seek to set aside default judgment within two years thereafter and to make her defense on giving bond for costs, without first showing meritorious defense.—Wright v. Burlison, 128 S.W.2d 238, 198 Ark. 187.

Default induced by plaintiff

Defendant, seeking to set aside verdict for plaintiff rendered in absence of defendant and his counsel, who was misled by statements of plaintiff's counsel, was not required to make showing on merits.—Black v. Foley, 135 S.E. 902, 117 W.Va. 490.

b. Sufficiency of Showing

The facts constituting the defense must be set forth in the application to open or vacate a default judgment; it is not sufficient to allege that the applicant has a meritorious defense.

The defense must be set forth in sufficient detail in an application to open or vacate a default judgment to permit the court to determine whether or not it is meritorious and sufficient;[74] it is not sufficient to allege that defendant has a good and meritorious defense.[75] A bare formal affidavit of merits, while it may be necessary, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section, is not a sufficiently specific showing.[76] A verified answer, however, is generally sufficient,[77] unless it consists only of a general denial.[78] The showing need not be made by affidavit where the record of the proceeding shows a meritorious defense.[79]

Evidence

c. Sufficiency of Defense

A defense to be meritorious must be legally sufficient, and it must not be unjust, inequitable, or merely technical.

A meritorious and substantial defense which must showing a meritorious defense to the action was sufficient without the presentation of evidence to support such defense.—Southwest Metals Co. v. Snedaker, 129 P.2d 314, 59 Ariz. 374.

In trespass action, wherein no affidavit of defense is necessary to put case at issue, court may grant petition to open default judgment in its discretion, without requiring defendant to state exact nature of defense in petition for such relief, where equities are clear.—Scott v. McElwing, 10 A.2d 436, 337 Pa. 273, 126 A.L.R. 367.

Pleading as evidence

Verified complaint may be used as evidence in determining fact of good cause of action, but the allegations therein are not conclusive, nor will they override a finding of the judge made on conflicting testimony.—Craver v. Spaugh, 38 S.E.2d 525, 226 N.C. 450.

Probative and ultimate facts

Where defendants who claimed easement on land sought relief from default and judgment entered against them in a suit to partition the land, defendants, in alleging facts to show that they had a good defense to the action on the merits, were not required to state probative facts concerning origin of their title to easement.—Thompson v. Sutton, 122 P.2d 975, 50 Cal.App.2d 272.

Reference to other documents

In determining sufficiency of affidavit of merits supporting motion to vacate default judgment, affidavit cannot be aided by reference to documents or records which are not part thereof.—Beltran v. Roll, 7 P.2d 248, 39 Ariz. 417.

Sworn testimony

In order to justify the setting aside of a default judgment, a showing of a meritorious defense, if based on oral testimony, contemplates sworn testimony developed in connection with the proceedings to set aside the judgment.—Jeffrey v. Kelly, Mo.App., 146 S.W.2d 850.

be shown in support of an application to open or vacate a default judgment is one which raises questions of law deserving investigation or a real controversy as to the essential facts.[80] A defense which is legally sufficient is not necessarily a meritorious defense which will support such an application; a defense to be meritorious must be just and equitable,[81] and a defense which is purely technical or unconscionable is not a meritorious defense.[82] It is not necessary that the defense should go to the entire action; it is sufficient if it purports to defeat any substantial part of plaintiff's claim.[83]

Among the defenses which have been held to be so technical, unconscionable, or lacking in equity as not to be sufficiently meritorious to support an application to open or vacate a default judgment are usury,[84] coverture of defendant,[85] plaintiff's want of capacity to sue,[86] ultra vires,[87] nul tiel record,[88] the statute of frauds,[89] a forfeiture or breach of condition,[90] fraudulent conduct in which defendant participated[91] or which he could have discovered and pleaded by using due diligence,[92] and a failure to allow proper credits,[93] although as to the latter there is also authority to the contrary.[94]

On the other hand, a variety of matters have been held to be sufficiently meritorious defenses to support an application to open or vacate a judgment;[95] such as a discharge in bankruptcy or insolvency,[96] invalidity of the statute or ordinance on which the action is founded,[97] release,[98] payment or tender,[99] failure of consideration,[1] non est factum,[2] denial of partnership on which liability depends,[3] want of title in plaintiff to the property in suit,[4] want of authority in an agent or trustee to make the contract or conveyance in suit,[5] want of service of process,[6] contributory negligence,[7] and res judicata.[8] The statute of limitations has been held to be[9] and not to be[10] a meritorious defense. A specific denial of material allegations on which the alleged liability rests is usually deemed sufficient.[11] Where the amount of the judgment is greatly in excess of what plaintiff is entitled to recover, the judgment may be opened or vacated.[12] A set-off or counterclaim will not support an application to open or vacate a judgment.[13]

d. Affidavit of Merits

An application to open a default judgment must in some jurisdictions be supported by an affidavit to the effect that the defendant has stated the case to his attorney, and that he is advised and believes that he has a good and substantial defense.

Under the practice prevailing in some jurisdictions, an application to open or vacate a default judgment must be supported by a formal affidavit of merits substantially to the effect that defendant has fully and fairly stated the case to his counsel, and that he has a good and substantial defense on the merits to the action, as he is advised by his counsel and verily believes.[14] The required affidavit has been held to be a jurisdictional prerequisite.[15] Where such an affidavit is necessary, it has been held that its lack cannot be supplied by a proposed answer or any other paper;[16] but a verified pleading has been accepted as a sufficient affidavit of merits,[17] and, where it fairly appears from the records and papers on which the motion is based that the moving party has a good defense on the merits, the sufficiency of an affidavit of merits, or the necessity for one, has been said to be discretionary with the trial court.[18]

The affidavit should be made by applicant himself, unless good reasons exist for having it made by another person;[19] but it may be made by his attorney, or by some other person, on showing a sufficient reason why the party himself does not make it.[20] In that case, however, the affidavit must show that affiant has personal knowledge of the facts of the case, and its averments must be based on such knowledge, and not on information or belief.[21] An affidavit by a third person not based on personal information has been held to be insufficient.[22]

e. Proposed Answer

An application to open or vacate a default judgment must in some jurisdictions be supported by a copy of the answer that the defendant proposes to interpose in the action.

In some jurisdictions, applicant for the vacation of a default judgment is required to present or file with his moving papers a copy of the answer which he proposes to put in when the judgment is opened, and the motion cannot be granted unless this is done,[23] unless, it has been held, the application is

(1) An unverified answer is not sufficient.—Pingree v. Reynolds, 73 P.2d 1266, 23 Cal.App.2d 649.

(2) Trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting motion of defendant to vacate default, although motion was not supported by such defendant's affidavit, and although copy of his proposed answer tendered on hearing of motion did not purport to be verified, where trial court, in light of verified answers of other defendants, which answers were included among papers specified in the notice of motion as a basis thereof, might well have concluded that such defendant had a meritorious defense. —Eustace v. Dechter, 128 P.2d 367, 53 Cal.App.2d 726.

Answer on file

Where defendants filed verified amended answer two days after default judgment was entered, it constituted part of record and files in case, and fact that no copy thereof was served on plaintiff or produced in court on motion to vacate default judgment was immaterial, where notice of motion stated that it was made on notice and record.—Eberhart v. Salazar, 235 P. 86, 71 Cal. App. 336.

The term "full answer" as used in statute requiring applicant to have judgment opened up, to file a "full answer," means an answer setting up a meritorious defense as to all or a material part of the petition.—

made during the judgment term,[24] or the complaint fails to state a cause of action.[25] Even where not required by mandatory statute or court rule, it has been deemed the better practice to accompany an application to open or vacate a judgment with a copy of the proposed answer.[26] While it has been held that an affidavit showing a meritorious defense may be accepted in lieu of a verified answer, in the discretion of the court,[27] generally such answer is required in addition to an affidavit of merits, both being required.[28] In cases where it is not necessary to show merits, as where the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, it is not necessary to present or file the proposed answer.[29]

Requisites and sufficiency. The answer filed with the motion must present an issuable plea to the merits,[30] meeting fully the matters contained in the declaration or complaint,[31] or some distinct part of it.[32] It has been held that the averments must be made on knowledge and not only on information and belief;[33] but there is also authority that the averments may be on information and belief,[34] except as to matters peculiarly within defendant's knowledge.[35] If the answer fails to state a defense, the motion must be overruled.[36] Facts as distinguished from mere conclusions must be alleged.[37] An answer consisting only of a general denial has been held insufficient,[38] but such an answer has been held sufficient when supported by affidavits setting out sufficient facts to support it.[39] Verification of the answer is required by some courts,[40] but not by others.[41] In any event, the failure to verify the answer is a curable defect.[42]

must be direct and appropriate to the relief sought, and there must be a compliance with the statutes governing the matter of procedure. As a general rule the proper procedure under the statutes is by a motion to open, vacate, or set aside the judgment.

The proceeding to open or vacate a default judgment must be a direct proceeding, and one which is appropriate to the relief sought,[43] unless the judgment is an absolute nullity, in which case defendant may have it declared void when plaintiff seeks to enforce it, without the necessity of a direct action to obtain its annulment.[44] The proceedings are equitable in nature and are to be governed by equitable principles.[45] Statutory regulations or court rules applicable to judgments by default govern in cases falling within the scope of their provisions,[46] and the party seeking to open or vacate a default judgment must proceed in accordance therewith,[47] and such statutes are to be given a liberal construction.[48] The statutory rules for vacating judgments have no application except as provided for therein.[49] Where both a default and a final judgment have been rendered, it has been held that defendant may not have the default opened without first vacating the judgment.[50]

As a general rule under the statutes providing for the opening or vacating of default judgments, the proper procedure is by a motion to open, vacate, or set aside the judgment,[51] and not by an

Where default judgment was rendered for less than amount allegedly due, because of mistake in drafting original petition, plaintiff's remedy was to have the judgment vacated or set aside and to be granted a new trial pursuant to statutory procedure, and an amendment of the pleadings to state the correct amount due is not of itself sufficient.—Johnson v. appeal,[52] or, as discussed in the C.J.S. title New Trial § 3, also 34 C.J. p 421 note 16, 46 C.J. p 62 note 57, by a motion for a new trial, but under some statutes an application to set aside a default judgment is in the nature of a motion for a new trial.[53] In some jurisdictions the motion to set aside a default judgment made more than a prescribed period of time after entry of the judgment is in the nature of a petition for a writ of error coram nobis.[54] If want of jurisdiction to render the default judgment appears on the face of the record the remedy has been held to be by application to the court to expunge the judgment from the court record.[55] Where the judgment is attacked because of defective service of summons although the return shows substantial compliance with the statute, a rule to show cause why the judgment should not be vacated has been held to be the proper procedure in some jurisdictions.[56]

The proceedings to open or set aside the judgment should be instituted in the same court in which the judgment was rendered.[57]

Petition or bill to review. Under some statutes a petition to review a default judgment[58] or a petition in the nature of a bill of review[59] may be filed under proper circumstances to set aside a default judgment. In accordance with some statutes, an action to review a default judgment will lie to review questions of jurisdiction and of the sufficiency of the complaint without a motion to set aside the judgment having first been made,[60] but an action of review to test the correctness of the entry of default will not lie unless a motion to set aside the default was first made, overruled, and exception taken.[61]

As continued or new proceeding. Dependent on the provisions of the statutes under which the application to open or set aside the default judgment has been instituted, the proceedings have been held to be a continuation of the suit in which the judgment complained of was rendered,[62] or they have

During and after term

Under some statutes an application during term should be by motion and subsequent to the term by petition or complaint.—National Life Ins. Co. of U. S. v. Wheeler, 137 N. E. 529, 79 Ind.App. 184.

Default in absence of judgment

Where defendants were defaulted, proper procedure, in absence of judgment, is by motion, not new suit, to set aside default.—Commercial Acceptance Co. v. Betzler, 132 N.E. 714, 95 Ind.App. 177.

Dependent on grounds

Under some statutes after the expiration of the term a judgment can be set aside on motion only on certain grounds and on all other grounds the proceeding must be by petition or complaint.—Boulter v. Cook, 234 P. 1101, 32 Wyo. 461, rehearing denied 236 P. 245, 32 Wyo. 461.

Motion to strike judgment been held to be new or independent proceedings[63] even though the application has been filed under the title of the cause in which the original judgment was rendered.[64]

Vacation on motion of court. As a general rule, where the court has retained jurisdiction of the cause it may set aside a default judgment on its own motion,[65] but it cannot set aside a default judgment on its own motion where the statute gives the right to act only on request by the aggrieved party.[66]

(3) Under rule of court generally

(1) In General

The motion or application for opening or vacating a default judgment must be made while the court may exercise jurisdiction over its judgment.

The motion or application for opening or vacating a default judgment must be made while the court may exercise jurisdiction over its judgment.[67] It has been held that, after execution has been returned satisfied, a default judgment cannot properly be vacated on a motion to set it aside,[68] but, as discussed infra § 379, a suit in equity may be available. A default judgment based on service by publication after garnishment may not be set aside on the motion of the garnishee under the claim that no assets of the principal defendant are in the possession of the garnishee until the issue of whether or not the garnishee holds assets is litigated in the garnishee action.[69]

(2) Under Statutory Provisions Generally

An application based on statutory grounds to open a default judgment must be made within the time limited by the statute.

Statutes in a number of jurisdictions specify the time within which an application to set aside a default judgment must be made, and, accordingly, the judgment may properly be opened or vacated within the period of time specified.[70] An appli-

Mode of service in original case

A distinction exists between an equitable bill of review as against a previously rendered judgment under process served on defendant, and similar action on judgment rendered when process was by publication, since, in the former, actions are docketed separately from action sought to be reviewed, and are tried out on issues made, while, in latter cases, motions are treated as motions for new trials in original case and are filed in that case and heard as part of it, irrespective of how they are indorsed, styled or docketed. —Smith v. cation based on statutory grounds to open a default judgment must be made within the time limited by the statute[71] or the application must be denied.[72] In some jurisdictions statutes setting forth the procedure for opening default judgments within a limited time have been construed as affording an additional and not an exclusive remedy, and the court may exercise its inherent power to afford relief in proper cases, in proceedings not based on such statutes, without regard to the statutory limitation of time.[73] An application to open a default judgment has been held not to come within the time limit prescribed for an application for a new trial[74] unless the statutory procedure for setting aside the

Constructive service

Laws relating to time for filing motions for new trial were inapplicable where suit was by publication and only appearance by attorney ad default judgment is in the nature of a motion for a new trial.[75]

(3) Under Rule of Court Generally

An application to open or vacate a default judgment which is not made within the time fixed by rule of court may properly be denied.

An application to open or vacate a default judgment not made within the time fixed by rule of court may properly be denied.[76] The court in its discretion may grant relief after the time limited therefor by its own rule,[77] but if the rules are made by a superior tribunal the court must deny an application made after the prescribed time.[78]

(4) During and after Term Generally

Where the application is filed during the term at which the default judgment was rendered, the judgment may properly be opened or vacated on any ground that moves the favorable discretion of the court. If the application is filed after the term, the judgment may not be opened or vacated except under statutory authorization or except on some ground on which the court has inherent power to act after term.

Deprivation of rights

Where it appears that defendant has been deprived of his rights by a default judgment, the common-law principle that the power of courts to vacate their judgments does not extend beyond the term at which they were entered is not adhered to, and a judgment may be vacated after term.—Webb Packing Co. v. Harmon, 193 A. 596, 8 W.W.Harr., Del., 476.

(5) Requirement of Diligence

A defendant must proceed with reasonable diligence in moving to set aside a default judgment.

Defendant must proceed with reasonable diligence in moving to set aside a default judgment,[84] and any apparent laches or delay must be explained and excused.[85] Laches or undue delay will bar relief[86] even in cases where the application has been made

34 C.J. p 427 note 57.

Necessity for knowledge
Mere passage of time since entry of judgment sought to be enforced does not create "laches" without precedent of knowledge on defendant's within the statutory time,[87] but it is not laches to make the application at the latest period prescribed by the statute where no intervening facts appear which make it inequitable to grant the application.[88] Under some statutes the motion must be filed within a reasonable time, not to exceed a specified period, after rendition of the default judgment.[89]

What constitutes due diligence[90] or a reasonable time[91] depends on the circumstances of the particular case.

(6) Default before Final Judgment

Statutes limiting the period of time within which proceedings may be instituted to open or set aside a default judgment have been held to be applicable to default judgments which are merely interlocutory.

General statutory limitations on the period of time within which proceedings may be instituted to open or set aside a default judgment have been held to apply only to final, and not to interlocutory, judgments,[92] but where the limitation is inserted in a statute pertaining to both interlocutory and final judgments it has been held to apply to interlocutory as well as to final judgments.[93] The rule against vacating a default judgment after expiration of the term at which it was rendered, discussed supra subdivision b (4) of this section, does not apply to a mere interlocutory entry of default, and such an entry may be vacated on proper grounds after adjournment of the term at which such default was entered;[94] and, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, a default on which no judgment has been entered may be set aside on an application made at any time.[95]

(7) Void or Irregular Judgments

Statutes imposing limitations on the time within which applications may be made to open or set aside default judgments and the doctrine of laches have been held to be inapplicable to default judgments which are void.

Statutes imposing limitations on the time within which an application may be made to open or set aside default judgments have been held to be inapplicable to a default judgment which is void[96] or void on its face,[97] such as where the judgment is illegal for want of jurisdiction[98] due to the lack of part or existence of such circumstances that defendant should have known of judgment and acted promptly by applying for vacation of default judgment to protect his rights.—Kenter Co. v. Errath, 32 A.2d 592, 21 N.J.Misc. 214.

proper summons or notice,[99] or where the default judgment has been entered by the clerk of the court without legal authority.[1] Some statutes have also been held not to apply to irregular judgments,[2] but other statutes have been held to apply if the judgment is merely irregular and voidable.[3]

The doctrine of laches does not apply in the case of a judgment by default which is void,[4] and under such circumstances a showing of diligence is not necessary.[5]

During or after term. A void judgment may properly be set aside at a subsequent term.[6] A judgment irregularly entered may be opened or vacated after term,[7] particularly where a statute so provides.[8]

Rules of court. A rule of court requiring an application to be filed within a fixed period of time has been held to apply only to a default judgment which is regularly entered,[9] and not to apply if there has not been a proper legal service of process,[10] although only a substantial compliance with the statute with respect to notice is required.[11] Such a court rule has also been held to require that the proceedings after default be regular.[12] Where the default was due to the judge having misled defendant, an order setting aside the default has been permitted even though the application was filed after the time prescribed by rule of court.[13]

(8) Commencement and Termination of Time

Under statutes prescribing the time within which applications to open or set aside default judgments must be filed, the commencement of the period limited depends on the terms of the particular statute under which application is made.

within which applications to open or set aside default judgments must be filed, the period limited has been held to begin to run at the date of the rendition of the judgment[14] and not at the time of the entry of the default,[15] at the time of the entry of the default rather than at the time of the entry of the judgment based on the default,[16] at the date of entry of the judgment in the default docket,[17] or at the time of notice of the entry of the judgment.[18] Notice, within the contemplation of statutes providing for the latter rule, has been held to mean actual knowledge of the judgment,[19] but it has also been held that the constructive notice afforded by recordation of the entry of judgment is sufficient.[20] Under some statutes notice must be given through actual service before the period limited will commence to run.[21]

Some statutes of this character have been held to cease to run at the time the motion to set aside the default judgment is filed although it is not heard or disposed of within the statutory period,[22] but under other statutes it has been held that not only the motion, but also the time for the hearing on the motion, must be within the statutory period.[23]

The running of the statutory period within which default judgments may be opened or vacated has been held not to be suspended by postponements by consent,[24] by the pendency of negotiations for a settlement,[25] or by a stipulation of counsel to waive the tardy filing of the motion.[26] Where, however, delay in applying to vacate a default judgment is attributed to the opposite party's acts and declarations, the lapse of time may become more or less immaterial.[27] The statutory period has been held to commence to run even though a motion for removal from a state court to a federal court is pending at the time of the rendition of the default judgment.[28]

The period limited for setting aside default judgments has been held not to be tolled by reason of defendant's insanity.[29]

c. Requisites and Sufficiency of Application Generally

An application to open or vacate a default judgment must comply with the requirements of the statutes and court rules.

An application to open or vacate a default judgment must be in compliance with the requirements of the statutes and court rules,[30] although it is generally held that a substantial compliance therewith is sufficient.[31] The application must contain allegations which show that defendant is entitled to the relief sought,[32] and it has been held that it should contain an offer to go to trial immediately.[33] The allegations must set forth facts as distinguished from mere conclusions.[34] The application must also state a proper ground for setting aside the default judgment,[35] and accordingly it must present facts reasonably excusing the failure to answer or appear,[36] such as by a showing of surprise, mistake, or excusable neglect,[37] or unavoidable casualty or misfortune,[38] and that defendant exercised due dil-

Default foreclosure judgment
In mortgage foreclosure suit, to which junior mortgagee is party defendant, a motion, made by such mortgagee before distribution of proceeds of foreclosure sale and served on all parties, who are thereafter given opportunity to plead and be heard, is proper means for opening up default foreclosure judgment to allow junior mortgagee to make claim to surplus proceeds, as such motion is equivalent to motion to set aside default.—Cowan v. Relief in furtherance of justice

Injustice of judgment
It is not sufficient for the moving party to say as a legal conclusion that the judgment is improper or unjust.—Gaskins v. California Ins. Co., 11 S.E.2d 436, 195 S.C. 376.

Trial not according to law
A motion to set aside a default judgment and reinstate the case on the ground that the cause was not set down for trial according to law states a mere conclusion and is insufficient.—Gibson v. Searcy, 137 N. E. 182, 192 Ind. 515.

Fraud
(1) A general allegation that default judgment resulted from fraud and collusion would be a mere "conclusion" and would not authorize vacation of judgment in absence of allegation of facts constituting fraud and collusion.—Higginbotham v. Adams, 14 S.E.2d 856, 192 Ga. 203.

Wyo.—Kelley v. Eidam, 231 P. 678, 32 Wyo. 271.

Excusable neglect of counsel
A motion to set aside a default judgment obtained on a cross complaint was not fatally defective because it specified the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of counsel of plaintiff, rather than of plaintiff, since an attorney is agent of his client, and neglect of the agent is the neglect of his principal.—Hicks v. Sanders, 104 P.2d 549, 40 Cal.App.2d 211.

38. Okl.—Gavin v. Heath, 256 P. 745, 125 Okl. 118.

Where record on face shows jurisdiction of parties and subject matter, petition to vacate judgment at subsequent term on ground of un-

igence;[39] and, where the default judgment was obtained on constructive or substituted service, it has been held that the application must allege that petitioner had no actual notice in time to appear and defend.[40] The petitioner's name should be correctly stated in the application even though it was incorrectly stated in the original proceedings.[41]

Construction of pleadings. The application is to be construed most strongly against the pleader.[42] A petition in an independent action when timely made may be treated as a statutory motion to set aside the judgment.[43]

Bond. Defendant cannot assail a default judgment where he fails to file a bond, as required by statute, unless he is excused therefrom.[44] Failure to give a bond on filing the petition has been held not to be a fatal defect since the court may require the bond after the order to reopen and retry the case is made.[45]

Proposed answer. The answer filed with the motion must present an issuable plea to the merits,[46] by averments made on knowledge and not only on information and belief.[47]

Amendment. The amendment of an application may be permitted,[48] and an amendment may be granted on the same day that a hearing on the motion is had,[49] but, after the statutory period of time for moving to set aside the judgment has expired, an amendment which would add new and distinct grounds may properly be denied.[50] The trial court may properly refuse permission to file an amendment which is insufficient to entitle petitioner to the relief sought.[51] After an adverse ruling it has been held that the motion cannot be amended.[52]

d. Answer and Other Pleadings

Plaintiff may raise an issue of fact by his answer, or he may by demurrer test the legal sufficiency of the motion to open or vacate the default judgment.

Plaintiff may raise an issue of fact on a motion to set aside a default judgment by filing a plea denying the facts alleged by the motion, or the legal sufficiency of the motion may be raised by demurrer.[53] Plaintiff's motion to strike defendant's motion to vacate a default judgment tests the sufficien-avoidable casualty or misfortune is subject to demurrer when facts pleaded do not show unavoidable casualty or misfortune, even though defense pleaded would be complete.—Foltz v. Deshon, 249 P. 358, 122 Okl. 42.

Impossibility of attorney's attendance at court

Petition to vacate a default judgment on ground of unavoidable casualty or misfortune was insufficient to warrant vacating the judgment, where it merely stated that it was impossible for defendants' attorney to be present in court on day when judgment was rendered without any explanation of why it was impossible.—Stockgrowers State Bank v. Clay, 90 P.2d 1102, 150 Kan. 93.

Ineffectiveness of diligence to prevent judgment

Defendant seeking to vacate default judgment because of unavoidable casualty or misfortune must state facts showing that no reasonable or proper diligence could have prevented trial or judgment.—Geo. O. Richardson Machinery Co. v. Scott, 251 P. 482, 122 Okl. 125, certiorari granted 47 S.Ct. 587, 274 U.S. 729, 71 L.Ed. 1319, certiorari dismissed 48 S.Ct. 264, 276 U.S. 128, 72 L.Ed. 497.

cy of defendant's motion.[54] A demurrer[55] or a motion to strike[56] admits all well-pleaded allegations of fact in defendant's motion, but not conclusions or inferences drawn by the pleader.[57]

By reason of his unconscionable conduct plaintiff may be precluded from pleading laches as a defense to the motion.[58]

e. Parties

A party in interest who is prejudiced by the default judgment may apply to have it set aside even though he is not a party to the record.

A party in interest who is prejudiced by the default judgment may apply to have it set aside,[59] even though he is not a party to the record.[60] An application may be made only by a person who has an interest in the subject matter of the suit[61] and who has been in some way prejudicially affected by the judgment or decree.[62] Where a person seeks to have a default judgment opened because of the death of a party prior to the judgment, he must show an interest derived from the decedent.[63]

Plaintiff may apply to have a default opened,[64] but if plaintiff is the successful party he cannot have a default judgment opened in the absence of a showing that he has been unjustly deprived of rights to which he is entitled.[65]

Consideration of demurrer

A demurrer to motion to strike out default judgment can be considered only as an admission of truth of facts alleged in the motion and sworn to by defendant and as evidence of willingness of plaintiff to submit question on affidavit of defendant without filing counter-affidavits or testimony in contradiction of the facts alleged in the motion.—Eddy v. Summers, 39 A.2d 812, 183 Md. 683.

57. Non compos mentis

In action on note, defendant's motion to vacate default judgment on ground that he was non compos mentis at time of execution of note, commencement of suit, and entry of judgment was vulnerable to plaintiff's motion to strike as against contention that such motion admitted defendant's mental incompetency at such times, in absence of allegations in defendant's motion as to foreign state court proceedings and judgments by which motion alleged that defendant was found non compos mentis and restored to legal capacity.—Standard Statistics Co. v. Davis, 45 N.E.2d 1005, 317 Ill.App. 377.

58. Imposition on court

Where plaintiff in an action of ejectment against an owner in fee and some of his tenants, after the cause had been placed on the calendar of one judge, went before a different judge, without notice to the owner, and without informing the judge that the answering defendant was the owner and the other defendants his tenants, and procured a dismissal as to the answering defendant and judgment by default against the other defendants, there was such a flagrant imposition on the court as to preclude plaintiff from pleading laches as a defense to a motion in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis to vacate the order of dismissal and default judgment.—Chicago Securities Corporation v. Olsen, 14 N.E.2d 893, 295 Ill.App. 615.

Payor of obligation

Fact that defendant, a seed company, paid to a lessor of land all that was due to the lessee for the services of the latter in raising a crop of seed on the land, such payment being made under agreement of all parties concerned to secure the payment of the rent due, did not deprive defendant of interest, so as to preclude it from moving to open a default judgment against it in favor of an assignee of the lessee, although the payment was made under an agreement of the lessor to defend any suit for the services rendered.—Sofuye v. Pieters-Wheeler Seed Co., 216 P. 990, 62 Cal.App. 193.

Grantors in an absolute conveyance of lands to secure payment of debt had equitable interest in the land, resulting in such an interest in subject matter of action to set aside such conveyance that they could maintain petition for review of default judgment obtained on service by publication, setting aside the conveyance.—Garrison v. Schmicke, Mo., 193 S.W.2d 614.

Transferee

A judgment in suit to quiet title, purporting to cancel trust deed securing payment of notes, which was void for lack of service on noteholders, was void as to transferee of notes after entry of judgment in quiet title suit, and such transferee, having interest in realty forming subject matter of quiet title suit, should be permitted to defend such suit.—Bray v. resentative or successor of defendant.[67] An application may not be made by one who has no interest in the subject matter of the action,[68] such as a person who has parted with all his interest before suit was filed,[69] but the application may be made in the name of a person who has parted with his interest after suit was filed where by statute or rules of practice an action may be continued in the name of the original party if the interest has been transferred.[70]

f. Notice or Process

Where a statute so requires, notice of a motion to set aside a default judgment must be given to the adverse party, unless the notice is waived.

In the absence of statute, notice of a motion to set aside a default judgment is unnecessary,[71] but if a statute so requires notice must be given to the adverse party,[72] unless notice is waived.[73] Persons who no longer have an interest in the subject matter of the suit are not adverse parties within such a statute.[74] Under some statutes it has been held that plaintiff must give notice where he seeks to reopen a default judgment in his favor in order to obtain additional relief,[75] but no notice to defendant is required where plaintiff seeks merely to vacate a judgment in favor of himself.[76]

The notice must comply substantially with the requirements of the statute,[77] and service of the notice must be timely made.[78] A statute which requires the grounds for the motion to be stated in

Notice to codefendant

(1) Where codefendant was a "necessary party" to defendant's motion to set aside default judgment and no notice of motion was given codefendant, trial court was without jurisdiction to set aside default judgment, as far as codefendant was affected thereby.—Washko v. Stewart, 112 P.2d 306, 44 Cal.App.2d 311.

(2) A motion to set aside a default judgment, made by one of several codefendants, need be served only on the party in whose favor the judgment runs where the statute simply provides for notice to the adverse party without defining that term.—Consolidated Wagon & Machine Co. v. Service at residence

Where attempted service, in suit to set aside default judgment quieting title, was defective because summons was not left at defendant's usual or last place of residence, court could not set aside default judgment.—Papuschak v. Burich, 185 N.E. 876, 97 Ind.App. 100.

Before presentation of application

Where the statute requires notice by the applicant of his intention to make an application to set aside a default judgment, the adverse party should be given notice prior to presentation of application to court, but need not be given notice prior to filing of application.—Bagsby v. Bagsby, 89 P.2d 345, 184 Okl. 627, 122 A. L.R. 155.

the notice is sufficiently complied with if the grounds for the motion can be ascertained from the accompanying affidavits[79] or other papers attached to the notice.[80] Under some statutes service may be made on plaintiff outside the state.[81]

It has been held that a party who has been served with proper notice may not raise an objection that notice was not given to another party.[82]

g. Affidavits on Application

As a general rule a petition or motion to open or vacate a default judgment must be verified or supported by affidavits as to the facts set forth.

As a general rule a petition or motion to open or vacate a default judgment must be verified or supported by affidavits as to the facts set forth.[83] The affidavits in support of the motion must include all the facts which are essential to entitle movant to the relief sought,[84] and a mere statement of legal conclusions is not sufficient.[85] An affidavit need not aver that defendant had no actual notice of the pendency of the action in time to answer where such condition is not a prerequisite to a right to relief[86] or where the statute provides that the party moving to set aside the default must make it appear by affidavit or other evidence that he had no notice of the pendency of the action.[87] In the absence of a statutory requirement, the court may properly consider a motion which is not sworn to,[88] and, where an affidavit is required only by the court's own rule, the court may dispense with the affidavit when its action does not prejudice the other party.[89]

A verification or affidavit may be made by defendant's attorney if it states that the matters sworn to are true of the attorney's own knowledge;[90] it is

Right to longer period for appearance

Where an action was still pending in the superior court for the purpose of proceeding to vacate the judgment when defendant or his attorneys were served in a foreign state, he cannot insist, as a matter of right, on a longer period for his appearance than he would have if he or his attorneys had been served physically within the state.—Harju v. insufficient if it does not allege personal knowledge[91] or the source of the information.[92] Under some statutes the affidavit need not be made by applicant but may be made by anyone knowing the facts, for and on behalf of all concerned.[93]

Affidavits are to be construed most strongly against the pleader.[94]

h. Counter-Affidavits

The party seeking to sustain the default judgment may present counter-affidavits with respect to the alleged grounds for vacating the judgment or to the matters set up in excuse of the defendant's failure to make his defense in good time.

The party seeking to sustain the default judgment may present affidavits in opposition to those of the moving party with respect to the alleged grounds for vacating the judgment or to the matters set up in excuse of defendant's failure to make his defense in due time,[95] but if a trial on the merits is improper, as discussed infra subdivision j (3) of this section, counter-affidavits on the merits of the defense are improper[96] and are insufficient as a basis for precluding relief to defendant.[97]

i. Evidence

(1) Presumptions and burden of proof
(2) Admissibility
(3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Presumptions and Burden of Proof

As a general rule the defaulted party has the burden of proving the facts entitling him to have the judgment opened or vacated. A judgment regular on its face will be presumed to have been properly entered where the record shows nothing inconsistent with the presumption.

and misfortune,[2] nonservice of summons,[3] absence of knowledge of the proceedings in time to make a defense,[4] prompt action to set aside the default,[5] irregularity in the entry of the judgment,[6] or fraud.[7]

A default judgment will be presumed to have been properly entered where it is regular on its face and the record shows nothing inconsistent with the presumption,[8] but, if the record does not affirmatively show that the proceedings were according to law, it has been held that nothing will be presumed in favor of the judgment.[9] Presumptions will be indulged, requiring evidence to overcome them, that the recitals in the record are correct,[10] and that a public officer fulfilled his duty.[11] The presumptions are prima facie only and may be overcome by proof.[12]

There is no presumption against a defendant only constructively served of notice or lack of diligence,[13] and, where the party seeking to set aside a default judgment rendered on constructive service makes a prima facie showing for relief, the burden is on plaintiff to show laches or inexcusable neglect or other circumstances which would make the granting of relief inequitable.[14] However, where the statute requires a showing that defendant had no actual notice, the burden of proving the absence of actual notice is on defendant.[15] In a proceeding to vacate a judgment rendered on con-

Impropriety of service by publication
In order to show a lack of jurisdiction in the court to render the judgment when service was had by publication, defendant must show that service by publication was improper.—Van Rhee v. Dysert, 191 N. W. 53, 154 Minn. 32.

Failure of attorney to act
Where motion for judgment by default was served on a regular practicing attorney in the division, who was a clerk for defendant's attorney and who accepted service as one of defendant's attorneys, if there was any reason why default judgment should not have been entered, the attorney had duty to inform himself and make the proper showing, and on failure to do so the court was required to conclude that default and judgment were duly and regularly entered.—Rubenstein v. Imlach, 9 Alaska 62.

9. Ark.—Vaccinol Products Corporation v. State, for Use and Benefit of Phillips County, 148 S.W.2d 1069, 201 Ark. 1066.

10. Sheriff's return
Fact that no attempt had been made to levy on personal estate of garnishee before proceeding against real estate was held not to justify opening default judgment against garnishee, in view of presumption that sheriff's return of nulla bona as to personalty was true.—Jennings v. Yanovitz, 175 A. 721, 115 Pa.Super. 427.

11. Duty to mail process
Where default judgment entered by circuit court was made subject of direct attack on ground of insufficient service of process on agent of defendant, presumption that copy of process was duly mailed by clerk to home office of defendant association by registered letter was held to prevail, in absence of affirmative showing that copy of process was not duly mailed.—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Agnew, 155 So. 205, 170 Miss. 604.

12. Ark.—First Nat. Bank v. Turner, 275 S.W. 703, 169 Ark. 393.

Service of summons
(1) On a motion by a defendant to vacate a judgment on the ground that no service of summons was made on him, the proof of service on which the judgment is predicated may be contradicted, and defendant may show that such proof of service is untrue.—Baird v. Ellison, 293 N. W. 794, 70 N.D. 261.

(2) Defendant could, on petition, after term, in order to vacate default judgment, show that place where copy of summons was left was not defendant's usual place of residence as recited in sheriff's return.—Hayes v. Kentucky Joint Stock Land Bank of Lexington, 181 N.E. 542, 125 Ohio St. 359.

Service not calculated to give actual notice
With respect to opening default judgment, if manner of constructive service is not calculated to give actual notice, notice is not presumed, and adversary has burden of proving it. —Naisbitt v. Herrick, 290 P. 950, 76 Utah 575.

15. Wyo.—Clarke v. Shoshoni Lumber Co., 224 P. 845, 31 Wyo. 205, error dismissed 48 S.Ct. 302, 276 U.S. 595, 72 L.Ed. 722.

structive service, it has been held that it is not incumbent on applicant to show that the original judgment was wrong.[16]

(2) Admissibility

As a general rule in passing on an application to open or set aside a default judgment, the court may admit any evidence which may properly aid it in reaching a conclusion, but irrelevant and immaterial evidence may properly be excluded.

Unless the decision in a proceeding to open or set aside a default judgment is to be made only on the motion and supporting affidavits,[17] or on the record,[18] as a general rule the court may admit any evidence which may properly aid it in reaching a conclusion,[19] but irrelevant and immaterial evidence may properly be excluded.[20] The exclusion of evidence showing that defendant is protected by insurance is not necessary.[21]

Meritorious defense. Evidence of a meritorious defense is admissible where the existence of a meritorious defense is properly at issue,[22] or where the court is entitled to determine whether a prima facie valid defense exists,[23] but it is not admissible where the existence of a defense is not in issue;[24] and, if the existence of the defense must be determined on the motion and affidavits alone, evidence as to whether the defense could be sustained is inadmissible.[25]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

The defaulted party should establish the facts on which he relies as grounds for relief by a preponderance of the evidence, or by clear, convincing, and satisfactory proof.

In order to be entitled to have a regularly entered default judgment opened or vacated, the defaulted party should establish the facts on which he relies as grounds for relief by a preponderance of the evidence,[26] or by clear, convincing, and satisfactory proof;[27] but it has been held that a showing of the excusability of neglect need not be strong where the showing of a meritorious defense is con-

19. Knowledge of action
Where defendants' notice of motion to set aside default judgment recited that they did not have knowledge of pendency of action until after judgment was rendered, admitting evidence tending to show that defendants had such knowledge before judgment was rendered, and part of which threw light on issue of service, was held not error.—Wood v. Peterson Farms Co., 22 P.2d 565, 132 Cal.App. 233.

Amended return of service
Where, on hearing of motion to set aside default judgment because of allegedly defective service of citation, amended return was admitted in evidence over objection and motion denied, court's conclusion was held tantamount to definite finding in favor of validity of return as amended, warranting inference that amendment was made with knowledge and consent of court and was, therefore, presumptively with its authority.—Employer's Reinsurance Corporation v. Brock, Tex.Civ.App., 74 S.W.2d 435, error dismissed.

21. References to insurance in affidavit
Refusal to strike references that defendant carried indemnity insurance, inserted in plaintiff's affidavit counter to defendant's affidavits in support of motion to open default judgment in automobile accident case, was held not error, since the reason for refusing to admit evidence, in a trial before a jury, that defendant is protected by insurance does not apply.—Bissonette v. vincing.[28] In order to show lack of notice or process, defendant may impeach an officer's return of process by parol evidence,[29] but the evidence must be clear, cogent, and convincing,[30] and the testimony of a single witness, however credible, has been held not to be sufficient.[31] A motion to set aside a default judgment for irregularities on the face of the record must be denied where it is supported only by evidence outside the record.[32]

Under the particular facts and circumstances of the case, the evidence has been held sufficient[33] or insufficient[34] generally to entitle defendant to have the default judgment set aside or vacated, or it has been specifically held sufficient[35] or insufficient[36] to show lack of proper notice or process; sufficient[37] or insufficient[38] to show mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect; sufficient to show unmoved to set aside judgment on ground that alleged agent was not its agent, a letter appearing in record showing that alleged agent once represented corporation in securing a contract was, without more, insufficient to prove fact of agency to receive process.—Consolidated Radio Artists v. j. Hearing and Determination

(1) In general
(2) Discretion of court generally
(3) Merits of cause of action or defense
(4) Principles and rules of decision

(1) In General

Generally, where issues of fact are presented in proceedings to open or set aside a default judgment, the court should conduct a hearing or require further depositions or affidavits, and thereupon determine the questions of law and of fact which are properly presented.

Where an application to open or set aside a default judgment is contested and issues of fact are presented, the court should conduct a hearing or require further depositions or affidavits on the issues raised,[46] and, unless the question can be determined from an inspection of the record, it has been held to be error to grant or dismiss the motion summarily or on an ex parte hearing.[47] Except to the extent to which the proceedings are governed by statute, the court has a reasonable discretion with respect to the form and manner of proof.[48]

Under some statutes the court may receive oral evidence,[49] or it may consider affidavits[50] in addition to those presented with the motion,[51] but under the statutes or rules of practice in some jurisdictions a verified petition which was the basis of the rule to show cause and ex parte affidavits may not be considered,[52] and applicant must supply proof by deposition taken on notice.[53] It is proper for the court to try and determine the existence and sufficiency of the alleged grounds for opening or vacating a default judgment before trying, or deciding the existence of, a meritorious cause of action or defense.[54]

The credibility or veracity of affiants or witnesses,[55] and the weight of the evidence,[56] are for the trial court's determination, and it must determine the questions of law and of fact which are properly presented in the proceedings.[57] Accord-

The trial court may take all the matters and circumstances bearing on the case into consideration,[65] including events which occur after entry of the default judgment,[66] and it may rest its action on matters within its own knowledge.[67] Facts and circumstances which are not material to the motion should not be considered.[68] Uncontradicted facts stated in motions or affidavits should be taken as

Defects in the original declaration will not be considered on a motion to vacate a default judgment entered at a prior term for the reason that errors in pleading cannot be questioned collaterally.—Lynn v. Multhauf, 279 Ill.App. 210.

Jurisdiction over subject matter

A motion to set aside a default judgment for lack of proper service does not raise question of jurisdiction over subject matter, but only goes to jurisdiction over person.—State ex rel. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique v. Falkenhainer, 274 S.W. 758, 309 Mo. 224.

Failure to demand bill of particulars before motion therefor may be considered by trial court in passing on motion to vacate default.—Butler v. Robinson, 244 P. 162, 76 Cal.App. 223.

Possibility of further litigation

On motion to set aside default judgment restraining defendants from discharging sewage on plaintiff's land, trial court, for purpose of avoiding "multiplicity of actions," was authorized to consider that defendants' claim of an easement for a drainage ditch over plaintiff's land would result in further litigation.—Bonfilio v. Ganger, 140 P.2d 861, 60 Cal.App.2d 405.

Defects of judgment

Where defects of the judgment are apparent on its face, they may be considered by the court, although they are not alleged in the application.—Watson Co., Builders, v. Bleeker, Tex.Civ.App., 269 S.W. 147.

Local customs and practices at bar may be considered by the court.—Lunt v. Van Gorden, 281 N.W. 743, 225 Iowa 1130—Chandler Mill. & Mfg. Co. v. Sinaiko, 208 N.W. 323, 201 Iowa 791.

Proof offered under allegations

On motion to set aside default judgment, in determining question of excuse for delay in filing answer, court will look not only to allegations in motions, but also to proof offered thereunder.—First Nat. Bank v. Southwest Nat. Bank of Dallas, Tex.Civ.App., 273 S.W. 951.

67. Iowa.—Mitchell v. Brennan, 241 N.W. 408, 213 Iowa 1375.
34 C.J. p 430 note 90.

Knowledge of issues in original suit

The trial judge, who tried case and entered judgment sought to be set aside by motion for new trial under statute authorizing such motion where judgment is rendered on service by publication against defendant who has not appeared, could employ knowledge of issues involved in original suit in passing on plaintiff's exception to the motion.—Devereaux v. Daube, Tex.Civ.App., 185 S.W.2d 211.

Telephone conversation

Where plaintiff's showing in support of motion to set aside default judgment was largely based on claim of an ex parte telephone conversation between counsel and the trial judge, trial judge could have appropriately filed affidavit setting out his own recollection of what telephone conversation was in order to make his own account of it a matter of record as preliminary to passing on application to set aside the default.—Taecker v. Parker, 93 P.2d 197, 34 Cal.App.2d 143.

68. Ill.—Standard Statistics Co. v. Davis, 45 N.E.2d 1005, 317 Ill.App. 377.

Acts of other persons

On defendant's motion to set aside a default judgment on ground of inadvertence and excusable neglect, court could not consider acts and negligence of other persons which were not material to the motion.—Gorman v. Yorke, 199 S.E. 729, 214 N. C. 524.

Review of evidence in original case

The right to open a default judg-

true.[69] The failure of defendant to produce available evidence may authorize an inference that the evidence would not corroborate him.[70]

Rights of purchasers. The rights of purchasers of the property which was the subject of the judgment may be determined in proceedings to open the judgment or in subsequent proceedings in which they are made parties.[71]

Diligence after filing motion. Defendant must exercise diligence in ascertaining the disposition made by the court of the motion.[72] Where defendant, after filing a motion to set aside the default judgment, delays in prosecuting the motion, the court should permit defendant to show, if he can, a sufficient excuse for the delay before dismissing the motion.[73]

Proceedings after error. Where the court has erred in failing to sustain a motion to dismiss the motion to set aside the judgment, the error has been held to render further proceedings nugatory.[74]

Time of hearing. The mere fact that the motion is not heard until a subsequent term after filing has been held not to preclude the court from granting relief on the ground that the motion has been overruled by operation of law.[75] Postponement of a hearing on the motion does not result in a discontinuance of the proceedings.[76]

Reopening case; rehearing. The court may properly reopen the case after it has been submitted for decision to receive additional evidence[77] even on its own motion,[78] or it may properly receive additional evidence without formally reopening the case.[79] Plaintiff's right to a reargument is not lost by accepting the costs ordered to be paid by defendant as a condition for reopening, receiving his answer, and excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties to the undertaking.[80] A motion for a rehearing filed after the court has lost jurisdiction is ineffectual.[81]

(2) Discretion of Court Generally

Except in cases where the statute gives an absolute right to relief, the court may exercise a large discretion in granting or denying an application to open or vacate a default judgment; but the discretion is not to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously.

Except in cases where the statute gives an absolute right to relief, in which case the court cannot refuse to open the default judgment,[82] as a general rule, a default judgment will not be opened or vacated as a matter of course;[83] but the court may exercise a large discretion in granting or denying

Lack of notice

For the subsequent purchase of land to be protected by the order entered in an action to set aside default judgment and for new trial, burden is on purchaser to plead and, if denied, to show that he purchased without notice of infirmity in judgment.—Rouse v. Rouse, 262 S.W. 596, 203 Ky. 415.

72. Tex.—Tyler v. Henderson, Civ. App., 162 S.W.2d 170, error refused.

Negligence of counsel

Allegations in judgment debtors' petition to set aside judgment, filed after debtors learned of order overruling their motion for new trial, that debtors were deprived of their right to appear and present their grounds for new trial because of alleged negligence of their counsel in failing to represent them at hearing on motion, were insufficient to entitle debtors to the relief sought.—Tyler v. Henderson, supra.

an abuse of discretion. The court's discretion is not a limitless discretion[85] to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously[86] without reference to any guiding rule or principle,[87] and its action must rest on competent evidence.[88] In particular cases the circumstances may be such as to leave no room for the exercise of discretion.[89]

Principles and rules as controlling the court's discretion are discussed infra subdivision j (4) of this section.

Judgment on constructive service. Under statutes which permit defendant, against whom a default judgment was taken on constructive service only, to vacate the judgment and to be admitted to defend the action, discussed generally supra § 335, it has been held that, on complying with the conditions of the statute, express and implied, the moving party acquires an absolute right to have the judgment opened, which the court has no discretion to deny,[90] but under some statutes of this nature it has been

(1) Where motion to set aside default judgment, with supporting affidavits, is filed during term at which default judgment was entered, trial court exercises a wide discretion.—Allemang v. White, 298 N.W. 658, 230 Iowa 526.

(2) A motion to set aside a default judgment, made promptly at the same term of court, is addressed to judicial discretion of trial court without the restrictions of code provisions relating to granting of a new trial when there has been a hearing on the merits of the case.—Vanover v. Ashley, 183 S.W.2d 944, 298 Ky. 722—Carr Creek Community Center v. Home Lumber Co., 125 S.W.2d 777, 276 Ky. 840.

(3) The rule that trial court has wide discretion in setting aside default judgment and that appellate court will not intervene until such discretion is abused is applicable only when timely application has been made at the same term in which judgment was rendered.—State ex rel. Sterling v. Shain, 129 S.W.2d 1048, 344 Mo. 891.

(4) The granting of motion to vacate default judgment during term rests within trial court's sound discretion, regardless of statute relating to judgments after term.—Miller v. Smith, 12 N.E.2d 296, 57 Ohio App. 127.

(5) Application, during term, to vacate default judgment, where not founded on statutory ground, is addressed to court's discretion.—Wheeler v. Walker, 294 P. 641, 147 Okl. 63—Arrington v. Wallace, 288 P. 986, 143 Okl. 286—Kennedy v. Martin, 223 P. 652, 101 Okl. 87.

(6) The discretion granted trial judges in opening or vacating their judgments during the term extends to a reasonable degree in both directions.—Woodruff v. Moore, 77 P.2d 62, 182 Okl. 120.

After term

Application to vacate default judgment, filed after term in which judgment was rendered, is addressed to sound legal discretion of court.—Upton v. Shipley, 49 P.2d 1048, 170 Okl. 423—Standard v. Fisher, 35 P.2d 878, 169 Okl. 18—First State Bank of Vian v. Armstrong, 300 P. 763, 150 Okl. 60—Morrell v. Morrell, 299 P. 866, 149 Okl. 187—Lott v. Kansas Osage Gas Co., 281 P. 297, 139 Okl. 6—W. W. Before entry of final judgment

(1) Trial court has discretionary power, for promotion of justice, to remove default at any time before judgment.—Doodlesack v. Superfine Coal & Ice Corporation, 198 N.E. 773, 292 Mass. 424, 101 A.L.R. 1247.

(2) Under the statute, a motion to set aside an order of default made before entry of final judgment is within the discretion of trial court to grant or deny.—Johnston v. Medina Improvement Club, 116 P.2d 272, 10 Wash.2d 44.

"Sound judicial discretion"

Exercise of "sound judicial discretion" in ruling on petition to vacate default judgment imports invocation by clear and trained mind of reason, courage, impartiality, and conscience to accomplish in calm spirit result in conformity to law and just and equitable to all parties. —Kravetz v. Lipofsky, 200 N.E. 865, 294 Mass. 80.

held that the granting of the application by the court is not mandatory but is dependent on the court's sound legal discretion,[91] although it is an abuse of discretion to refuse to vacate the judgment if a meritorious defense is presented which, if proved, would as a matter of law require a judgment in favor of defendant.[92]

(3) Merits of Cause of Action or Defense

As a general rule under the statutes providing for proceedings to open or vacate a default judgment the court must determine whether or not the applicant has a valid cause of action or a meritorious defense before it may open or vacate a default judgment.

As a general rule under the statutes the court may not open or vacate a default judgment until it has determined that applicant has a valid cause of action or a meritorious defense to the judgment rendered.[93] In proceedings under some statutes the court is limited to a determination of whether or not a valid defense is presented by the motion and affidavits, and it may not conduct a hearing on the merits,[94] or consider controverting affidavits or evidence,[95] to determine whether the asserted cause of action or defense should prevail, but under other statutes it has been held that a judgment will not be vacated until a trial on the merits has been had and the validity of the defense asserted has been established.[96] Under the latter statutes the court

Laches

If the question of laches is presented, a case arises for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and it must determine whether or not the laches is of a character that should preclude the relief.—Boland v. All Persons, Etc., 117 P. 547, 160 Cal. 486—Tucker v. Tucker, 139 P. 2d 348, 59 Cal.App.2d 557.

Good cause

Whether a motion states "good cause," within statute providing that defendant against whom judgment is rendered on service by publication may move for new trial on showing good cause, is within trial court's discretion.—Smith v. Higginbotham, Tex.Civ.App., 112 S.W.2d 770—Strickland v. Baugh, Tex.Civ.App., 169 S.W. 181.

Filing motion and service of notice

The filing and service of a notice of motion to set aside default judgment, followed by a motion for relief from the default and proof that notice and motion is seasonably given and made, constitutes a prima facie showing in favor of a defendant against whom a default judgment has been obtained.—Nahas v. Allegations deemed true

(1) In considering whether a meritorious defense was presented by defendant moving to have default judgment rendered on service by publication set aside, allegations of answer and cross-complaint are deemed to be true.—Evans v. Hallas, Ariz., 167 P.2d 94.

(2) Statements, in verified petition for review of default judgment, that allegations of plaintiff's petition were untrue and that defendants had a good defense to the action, were considered conclusively true for purpose of showing good cause for setting aside the judgment.—Garrison v. Schmicke, Mo., 193 S.W. 2d 614.

On motion within term time where the court's jurisdiction is not dependent on statute, the truth of allegations of valid defense is not to be considered on motion to vacate must first adjudicate that a meritorious ground for vacating the judgment exists, and after it does so it proceeds to a trial on the merits.[97] Under some statutes, where a default judgment is based on personal service of process, on a motion to vacate made on grounds such as excusable neglect or unavoidable casualty a final determination of the validity of the defense may not be made,[98] but at most the court can hear evidence only to determine whether defendant could present a prima facie defense;[99] but if judgment has been rendered on constructive service the merits of the suit may be determined in connection with the hearing of the motion in order to avoid trial of the two issues by piecemeal.[1]

(4) Principles and Rules of Decision

An application to open or vacate a default judgment should be disposed of in accordance with fixed legal and equitable principles to serve the ends of substantial justice. The court should exercise its power liberally to relieve from the judgment and it should resolve a real doubt in favor of the application.

An application to open or vacate a default judgment should be disposed of in accordance with fixed legal[2] and equitable[3] principles in such a manner as to serve, and not to defeat or impede, the ends of substantial justice.[4] Courts usually are liberal in opening judgments entered for want of appearance if the default was not willful,[5] and, where defendant has a reasonable excuse and appears to have a default.—Resnick v. Paryzek, 154 N. E. 350, 23 Ohio App. 327.

Judgment on constructive service

If judgment has been rendered on constructive service the judgment will not be vacated until after a hearing on the merits.—Davis v. Collums, 168 S.W.2d 1103, 205 Ark. 390—American Inv. Co. v. New cause of action

Where motion for new trial was filed by party who was served by publication in action on note, and, in answer to the motion, plaintiff filed amended answer wherein plaintiff set up cause of action on a renewal of the note, action of trial court in refusing to grant motion to confine hearing to question of new trial and to strike the new cause of action set up by plaintiff was not error.—Smith v. During term

(1) An effort to set aside a default judgment, made promptly at the same term of court when no such fixation of rights has occurred that the setting aside of judgment would prejudice anybody, is regarded with favor.—Vanover v. Ashley, 183 S.W.2d 944, 298 Ky. 722.

(2) Courts adopt a liberal attitude in setting aside default judgments during the term at which they were rendered, and permitting defense to be made, and a party applying to have a default judgment set aside is not required to show himself strictly entitled to the legal relief under statutes regulating granting of new trial.—Bond v. W. T. Congleton Co., 129 S.W.2d 570, 278 Ky. 829.

(3) In passing on applications to strike out default judgment when such applications are made at the same term at which judgments are entered, courts usually act liberally and on reasonable proof of merit and other equitable circumstances, strike out the judgment, and let defendant in to be heard.—Eddy v. Summers, Me., 39 A.2d 812.

(4) Courts are usually liberal in opening default or setting aside decree or judgment during term, but different rule obtains after term.—Steeves v. Steeves, 9 P.2d 815, 139 Or. 261.

Proceedings under statute or independent suit

The courts are more inclined to open up default judgment under statute authorizing such relief for mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect than to vacate judgment in an independent suit.—Mattoon v. Cole, 143 P.2d 679, 172 Or. 664—Hartley v. Rice, 261 P. 689, 123 Or. 237.

ment rendered after defendant has had his day in court and been heard in his own behalf,[10] or one entered on a confession of judgment.[11] Where there are circumstances of fraud or great oppression in the case, a default will be readily opened.[12] Generally courts look with more favor on an application by a defaulted defendant than on a similar application by a defaulted plaintiff.[13]

The court cannot properly vacate a default judgment without sufficient cause,[14] and where defendant fails to show good grounds for setting the default judgment or decrec aside,[15] or fails to bring himself within the terms of the statute granting relief,[16] the application is properly denied.

Whether or not relief should be granted to applicant or whether the court has abused its discretion in granting or refusing relief depends on the peculiar facts and circumstances of the individual case,[17] and under particular facts and circumstances the opening or vacating of a default judgment has been held to be,[18] or has been held not to be,[19] improper or an abuse of discretion, or a refusal to

Great injustice as sole grounds
Fact that refusal to open default judgment would result in great injustice to defendant, failing to answer without sufficient excuse, does not justify vacation thereof.—Rutledge v. Junior Order of United American Mechanics, 193 S.E. 434, 185 S.C. 142.

Failure to redeem
Where a judgment by default, barring redemption, has been rendered against a junior encumbrancer through his excusable neglect, and he learns of the judgment while the period of redemption is running, but fails to redeem, he cannot have the judgment vacated.—Becker v. Tell City Bank, 41 N.E. 323, 142 Ind. 99.

Failure to except to sale
The chancellor properly refused to reopen a mortgage foreclosure action wherein a default judgment was rendered where parties, although sui juris and properly before the court when judgment was rendered, failed to except to the report of sale which was confirmed.—Colston v. Mitchell's Adm'x, 175 S.W.2d 1020, 296 Ky. 1.

Absence of objection

open or vacate a default judgment has been held to be,[20] or has been held not to be,[21] improper or an abuse of discretion. The court may refuse to grant the application even in cases where the existence of a meritorious defense is shown,[22] but if defendant shows a legal excuse for failure to appear and a meritorious defense to the action, and in all matters complies with the requisites of the statute, it has been held that the court no longer has discretion but must set aside the judgment.[23]

The fact that defendant may have challenged the validity of service by publication and the jurisdiction of the court to render any judgment will not justify a denial of the application to have the judgment opened.[24] Where the order of default[25] or the default judgment[26] has been entered prematurely, an order setting aside the judgment is proper. Where the judgment has been entered without jurisdiction the court must grant the application to vacate the judgment.[27] It has been held that the court cannot vacate the judgment where the evidence does not correspond with the petition.[28]

Where a default judgment is subject to be set aside because of the lack of necessary allegations in the original petition on which judgment was rendered, it has been held that allegations or proof on the motion to set aside the judgment may not be used to supply the defects in the original petition.[29]

k. Relief Awarded

(1) In general
(2) Modification or partial vacation
(3) Terms and conditions of relief

(1) In General

The relief which may be awarded in a proceeding to open or vacate a default judgment depends in a large measure on the terms of the particular statute under which the proceeding is brought.

In accordance with the provisions of the statutes and the interpretation thereof in the several jurisdictions, the court may render final judgment on the merits after vacating the judgment;[30] it can only enter an order setting aside the judgment and cannot give judgment on the merits;[31] or, before it has adjudicated the merits of the case, the only order it may make is one suspending the operation of the judgment.[32] It is improper for the court to restrain plaintiff from collecting the judgment pending proceedings to have the judgment vacated where there has not been a compliance with the statutory conditions for granting such relief.[33] Where the court acts under its inherent powers it may award relief other than that provided for in proceedings solely under the statute.[34]

It is an idle act for the court to set aside a judgment entered on a default if it has no jurisdiction to set aside the default.[35]

Rights of third persons. Intervening rights of third persons acquired in good faith will be saved, either by provision of the statute itself or by the order of the court.[36]

(2) Modification or Partial Vacation

Where a default judgment is severable, the portion of the judgment which is irregular or erroneous may be set aside and other portions of the judgment may be permitted to stand.

Where a judgment is severable, the portion of the judgment which is irregular or erroneous may be set aside and other portions of the judgment may be permitted to stand,[37] and if a partial defense is presented the court may modify or set aside the decree to that extent.[38] Although the court allows the judgment itself to stand, it may permit the question as to the quantum of damages to be opened for hearing.[39] Where a default judgment is entered as a unit against two or more defendants and is so irregular or erroneous as to necessitate its vacation as to one defendant, it has been held that it must be set aside as to all;[40] but where a default judg-

28. Statutory ground not alleged
Where petition to vacate default judgment alleged fraud, court was held unauthorized to vacate judgment on proved statutory ground of irregularity, in absence of order amending petition to correspond with evidence.—Mt. Ida School v. Clark, 177 N.E. 604, 39 Ohio App. 389.

Right to accounting
Where there was no dispute about original amount of mortgage indebtedness and no dispute about the payments made or about the fact that payments were to be made monthly on mortgage on which a default judgment was taken, the mortgagors who filed suit to set aside default judgment as having been obtained by fraud were not entitled to an accounting.—Brown v. (a) In General

Where the court has discretion in opening or vacating a default judgment it may impose, as a condition to granting the application, such terms as may be just and reasonable.

Where the opening or vacation of a default judgment is discretionary with the court, the court may impose, as a condition to granting the application, such terms as may be just and reasonable[43] and which will preserve plaintiff's rights.[44] Likewise, under some statutes which entitle defendant to have a default judgment obtained on constructive service opened or vacated, as discussed supra § 334, the court may impose such terms as may be just.[45] Terms are not properly imposed where the default was caused by the other party's wrongful conduct,[46] where the judgment was taken without notice to defendant,[47] where the judgment was entered prematurely or improvidently,[48] or where it was procured by fraud and collusion.[49] Where the power to impose terms is regulated by statute it has been held that the court may not exceed the statutory restrictions.[50]

The amount of the judgment may be reduced to correspond with the prayer for relief before it is vacated on condition.[51]

Payment of amount admitted to be due. It is proper, on opening a default, to require defendant to pay as much of plaintiff's claim as he admits to be due, as a condition of allowing him to dispute the rest.[52]

Judgment against coöwners

Where default judgment was entered as unit against all coöwners of tavern for automobile accident injuries because driver of automobile which caused injuries was intoxicated on liquor purchased in such tavern, and thereafter court vacated the default as to infant coöwner because no guardian ad litem had been appointed to represent her, the default judgment was required to be vacated as to all other coöwners.—Skiras v. Magenis, 58 N.E.2d 322, 324 Ill.App. 250.

Use of testimony of deceased witness

Defendant's application to open default judgment which had been entered on inquest sought favor of the court, and, therefore, irrespective of whether under present circumstances right of plaintiff to use, without defendant's consent, testimony of witness who had died since taking of inquest was sanctioned by law, trial court should have required defendant to stipulate that such testimony might be used as a condition to opening the default.—New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. Augner, 28 N.Y.S.2d 277, 262 App.Div. 113.

(b) Paying or Securing Costs and Expenses

Unless otherwise provided by statute, the trial court in opening or vacating a default judgment may impose such terms as to the payment of costs as in its discretion it determines to be proper.

Unless otherwise provided by statute,[53] the trial court in opening or vacating a default judgment may impose such terms as to the payment of costs as in its discretion it determines to be proper.[54] It is usually proper for the court to impose as a condition a requirement that defendant shall pay the accrued costs in the action,[55] and also, in a proper case and where justice requires it, the disbursements of the opposite party,[56] his reasonable personal expense incurred in connection with the suit,[57] a proper fee to his attorneys,[58] and the costs of the motion itself.[59] Where a judgment is opened or vacated as a matter of favor or grace to defendant and on his motion, costs ordinarily should be imposed on him.[60]

Under some statutes payment of all the costs which have accrued is a mandatory condition for opening the default,[61] but, if not required by statute, the court may properly omit the imposition of costs as a condition,[62] particularly if it is not insisted on by plaintiff[63] or if defendant is not chargeable with any negligence or fault in suffering the judgment.[64] The imposition of a condition that defendant pay all costs may be erroneous.[65] The court may properly require the payment of a lump sum as a condition for opening the judgment.[66]

Where it is improper to impose any terms as a condition of opening the judgment, it is not proper to require payment of costs, etc., as a condition of relief,[67] as where the court had no jurisdiction of defendant,[68] where the entry of the default judgment was erroneous,[69] or where judgment by default was entered at a time when the party was not in default[70] or in violation of an agreement not to do so.[71]

Defendant may be required to secure any costs and disbursements that may thereafter be adjudged in favor of plaintiff in the action.[72] is done, the court may impose the condition that defendant shall furnish security for them,[74] but it has also been held to be error to award costs of the motion to abide the event.[75]

(c) Limiting Defenses

The court in its discretion may require, as a condition to opening a default judgment, that the defendant shall plead issuably or to the merits, or it may restrict him to the defenses set up in his petition or moving papers.

It is in the discretion of the court on opening a default judgment to require as a condition that defendant shall plead issuably or to the merits,[76] and that he shall not resort to a demurrer[77] or dilatory plea.[78] In like manner, it may, if it deems proper, restrict him to the defenses set up in his petition or moving papers.[79] So the court, in its discretion, may make it a condition that defendant shall forbear to set up some particular defense which is considered unconscionable or purely technical.[80] It is an abuse of discretion, however, to require defendant to waive a meritorious defense.[81] The statute of limitations has been held to be a meritorious defense which should not be excluded as a condition for opening the default judgment,[82] if it would have been available as a defense at the time the default judgment was entered,[83] but if the statute of limitations would not have been a defense at the time the default was taken,[84] or if the action is one to which a statute of limitations cannot apply,[85] defendant may be required to waive or abandon it as a condition to opening the judgment.

(d) Securing Payment of Judgment

Where conditions may be imposed on the opening of a default judgment the court may require the defendant to give a bond or undertaking to pay any judgment plaintiff may eventually recover.

Where conditions may be imposed, it is within the authority of the court, on opening a default judgment, to impose the condition that defendant shall give a bond or undertaking to pay any judgment plaintiff may eventually recover.[86] This, however, is regarded as a severe condition, and will be held to be an abuse of discretion unless the facts of the case and the situation of the parties fully justify it.[87] Security for payment of the judgment must be made a condition when so provided by statute.[88] It is also competent for the court in proper cases to require defendant to give an undertaking that he will not sell or encumber any of his property so as to hinder plaintiff in the collection of his claim,[89] or even to require him to deposit with the clerk of the court a sum sufficient to secure plaintiff's claim.[90]

(e) Allowing Judgment to Stand as Security

On opening a default judgment the court may properly impose the condition that the judgment already entered shall stand as security for the amount ultimately recovered.

On opening a default judgment to let in a defense it is proper to impose the condition that the judgment already entered shall stand as security for the amount ultimately recovered.[91] Where this is done the judgment exists only for the purpose of security.[92] Such condition, however, need not be imposed where it is not necessary for plaintiff's protection;[93] and, where the judgment debtor has a right to have the judgment opened or vacated unconditionally, such right cannot be clogged with the condition that the judgment shall stand as security.[94]

Where the statute requires security for payment of the judgment, the court cannot accept the judgment itself as security by ordering it to remain cautionary.[95]

(f) Performance of Conditions

Compliance with the terms imposed on the opening of a default judgment is a condition precedent to the granting of relief.

Compliance with the terms imposed on the opening of a default judgment is a condition precedent to the relief granted; unless and until they are complied with the judgment remains in full force and effect.[96] The performance of the conditions, however, may be waived by the party for whose benefit they were prescribed,[97] and, where a judgment which should never have been entered is stricken off on terms, an order reinstating it for noncompliance with the terms is erroneous.[98]

Order requiring surety company bond

Bond signed by individual surety was held not to comply with order for setting aside default judgment on filing surety company bond.—Boyle v. Berg, 218 N.W. 757, 242 Mich. 225.

Payment of costs

Under statute dealing with the opening of judgment after default on service by publication, the requirement that applicant must "pay all costs, if the court require them to be paid," does not require of applicant a formal offer to pay costs before the court orders that they be paid.—Bagsby v. Bagsby, 89 P.2d 345, 184 Okl. 627, 122 A.L.R. 155.

Sending check by registered mail

Defendants' tender to plaintiff's attorney of cashier's check, payable to plaintiff, for sum which trial court directed defendants to pay plaintiff as costs in order conditionally granting defendants' motion to set aside default and judgment thereon, and sending of check by registered mail, addressed to plaintiff at room near that of plaintiff in same building, after plaintiff's attorney had refused check, but within time limited by court order, was sufficient compliance with terms thereof, so as to authorize final order unconditionally setting aside default and judgment.—Hayes v. Pierce, 104 P.2d 499, 15 Cal.2d 662—Hayes v. Pierce, 64 P.2d 728, 13 Cal.App.2d 531.

Search for accrued costs

Where the trial court orders a default judgment reopened pursuant to statute on condition that defendant pay costs, defendant is not ordinarily required to search beyond appearance docket for accrued costs in an effort to comply with order.—Lofton v. McLucas, 113 P.2d 966, 189 Okl. 115.

Payment from account with clerk

Defendant was held not to have failed to pay costs required by order vacating default judgment where credit of defense counsel's running account with clerk of court relieved plaintiff from responsibility of payment.—Powers v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 166 S.E. 729, 167 S. C. 513.

Relief from consequences of noncompliance

Although practice of moving at special term after same question has been passed on by another special term is not approved, the special term had power under circumstances to relieve defendant from noncompliance with order of special term as made by official referee, where the order conditionally opened defendant's default, which, however, was never opened, since defendant defaulted in complying with such order.—Schleeter v. Bommer, 53 N.Y. S.2d 167, 268 App.Div. 1020.

(1) In General

An order vacating a default judgment is properly limited to the issues which are before the court, and which are necessary to a decision.

An order vacating a default judgment is properly limited to the issues which are before the court,[2] and which are necessary to a decision.[3] Although a statute requires the grounds on which a new trial is granted to be specified of record, it has been held that the court in setting aside a default judgment need not specify the grounds for its action.[4] On denial of a motion to vacate a default judgment it has been held that it is error for the court to insert in the order a provision permitting defendant to answer.[5] An order that the judgment be set aside and that the cause be retained to be heard on the merits has been held to vacate the verdict on which the judgment was based as well as the judgment.[6]

Where the statute provides that a judgment shall not be vacated until it is adjudged that a valid defense exists, the entry of the order vacating the judgment must show that the court adjudged that a valid defense existed if not otherwise apparent on the record.[7]

An order may constitute a judicial order although it is not entered in the court's minutes.[8] The trial court's memorandum may be considered with the order vacating the judgment to determine the reason for the order.[9]

Nunc pro tunc entry. Where no formal order appears of record although a hearing was had and judgment reopened, the court may enter a nunc pro tunc order in accordance with the facts reflected by the minutes.[10] An order containing no recital that it is entered as of an earlier date and which relates to a subject other than an earlier order cannot be regarded as a nunc pro tunc entry as of the time of the earlier order.[11]

Right to knowledge of order. If the court sustains defendant's motion to set aside a default judgment, plaintiff is entitled to know that fact.[12]

(2) Operation and Effect

An order vacating a default judgment is binding on all parties and must be given full faith and credit until vacated or reversed.

An order vacating a default judgment is binding on all parties[13] and must be given full faith and credit until vacated or reversed.[14] As a general rule the order leaves the case pending for further and final action on the merits,[15] and the case stands in the docket in the same condition as though the judgment had never been rendered.[16] The order

Vacating judgment to bring in party
Vacating default judgment in order to allow the bringing in of a necessary party did not justify setting aside the default itself but only the judgment.—Taylor v. Western States Land & Mortgage Co., 147 P.2d 36, 63 Cal.App.2d 401.

Lack of jurisdiction
An order vacating default judgment because of lack of jurisdiction is not void as transcending scope of rule to show cause why default judgment should not be reopened.—Palansky v. Reich, 164 A. 701, 11 N.J. Misc. 106, affirmed 168 A. 297, 11 N. J.Law 241.

Order at same term
Setting aside default judgment on motion at same term judgment was rendered does not affect merits, but provides means whereby merits may be tried.—Metz v. Melton Coal Co., 47 S.W.2d 803, 185 Ark. 486.

Granting new trial
Setting aside of default judgment amounted to granting of new trial at term of court at which judgment was entered and set aside.—Saunders v. Hornsby, Tex.Civ.App., 173 S. W.2d 795, error refused.

16. Tex.—Trujillo v. Piarote, 53 S.

gives defendant only a right to be heard and does not preclude the court on final hearing from entering such judgment as is warranted by the facts of the case.[17] In a statutory proceeding an order vacating a decree will not be given greater effect than that contemplated by the statute.[18]

A judgment overruling a motion to vacate a default judgment for lack of jurisdiction constitutes a decision that the default judgment was valid in a jurisdictional sense.[19]

A judgment setting aside a default may be amended during the term.[20]

Void orders. An order, entered without jurisdiction, opening a judgment of default is void,[21] and the court may properly disregard such order.[22] Subsequent orders based on a void order vacating a default are also invalid.[23]

(3) Renewal of Application

The strict rule of res judicata does not apply to a decision on a motion to vacate a default judgment and the court in its discretion may allow and act on a renewal of the motion.
